Administration reallocates positions

RESTRUCTURING: New duties in academic plans given to vice chancellor

By Mason Stockstill
Daily Bruin Senior Staff

Responsibility for all of UCLA's academics has now been consolidated into fewer administrative hands.

With restructuring at the highest level, the executive vice chancellor will take over the academic planning duties previously held by the vice chancellor for academic planning and budget, which will become an entirely financial position.

"The title was changed with the idea that academic planning is the responsibility of the executive vice chancellor, working closely with the chancellor," Chancellor Albert Carnesale said.

According to Ted Mitchell, the former vice chancellor of academic planning and budget, the new position will be "very different" from the previous position.

"The new position is far more concerned with day-to-day issues of finance and less directly involved in issues of academic budgeting," he said.

Mitchell is now the vice chancellor of external affairs, a position that he held last year in addition to vice chancellor of academic planning and budget.

The position of vice chancellor of academic planning and budget was abolished when Mitchell recommended to then-Chancellor Charles Young that a new position be created, effectively dividing academic and financial strategy.

"I felt that the campus was best served by creating a new position," Mitchell said.

Mitchell said that since the executive vice chancellor was already the head of academic planning, having another vice chancellor doing the same thing was not necessary.

"It didn't really make sense to have a vice chancellor charged with academic budgeting reporting to the executive vice chancellor in charge of academics," he said.

After consulting with Mitchell, Young decided that the responsibilities of academic planning were better left to the chancellor and executive vice chancellor. The new vice chancellor for budget and finance will be the equivalent of a company's CFO.

The position of executive vice chancellor is also waiting to be filled, since Charles Kennel, who has held the position since 1996, will be leaving in the spring to head the Scripps institute of Oceanography at UCSD.

Carnesale said that he would be inclined to consider someone with a non-academic background for the vice chancellorship of budget and finance.

"I would expect the vice chancellor for budget and finance to be a professional in this area, rather than an academic," he said.

The chancellor also mentioned that he would not be averse to choosing someone from the private sector to take the helm of budget and finance.

"I would like them to be somebody who has some private sector experience," he said.

Carnesale was quick to point out that while private sector experience in the area of budget and finance would be a plus, it is necessary to choose someone who can work well in the unique environment of a large public university such as UCLA.

"It is important that they be able to function in the university environment, which is substantially more collegial than it is in the private sector," he said.

Pencils in hand, designers learn to depend less on computers

PROFILE: Professor Ivan Chermayeff advocates flexibility, practical skills

By H. Jayne Ahn and Andy Shah
Daily Bruin Contributors

Behind the famous symbols for NBC, Mobil, and Xerox is a man named Ivan Chermayeff, who likes "simplicity for its freshness" in graphic design.

Chermayeff, an internationally-renowned graphic designer and artist, was appointed this year's Art Council Professor of Design and is currently sharing his expertise with a design class in the School of Arts and Architecture.

Prior to taking his seminar, design students had to submit portfolios and be approved by the department.

"Normally we do more theoretical stuff and computer in our department," said Jason Moskovitz, a third-year design student.

"But (with Chermayeff) we are doing a lot of collage and cut-and-paste which is more 'real-world' than we are used to," Moskovitz said.

Both the students and the visiting professor seem to agree that they are trying new approaches to learning design.

"The students are fun, articulate and hardworking. But they are rather unknowledgeable about other disciplines and they delve very much into the computers and multimedia." Chermayeff said.

"They don't draw, and they don't use their hands much. I think that's a shortcoming in how flexible they can be.

"If you never hold a brush, or pen, or pencil in your hand and only press buttons, you are losing something," he said.

The School of Arts and Architecture should be more "multi-disciplinary" and allow students to have some experiences in other ways of learning "besides moving mice around in the dark," according to Chermayeff.

Protesters reject military action in Iraq

POLITICS: Gathering in Westwood opts stronger ties with Middle East

By Lawrence Ferchaw
Daily Bruin Contributor

On the day President Clinton spoke at the Pentagon to make his case for military action in Iraq, protesters rejected his case at a demonstration in Westwood.

On Tuesday, the Save the Iraqi Children Committee organized a protest at the Federal Building in Westwood, which attracted a diverse mix of citizens ranging from Arab Americans to the Veterans for Peace. Despite the diversity of the protesters, the message was unified.

"Bombing Iraq defeats the whole purpose of protecting humanity," said Stacy Hartell, a USC student.

This message was echoed in the chants against the economic sanctions on Iraq, imposed at the end of the Gulf War seven years ago.

Over 1.5 million people have died in Iraq because of the sanctions, said Preston Wood, the co-coordinator of the rally.

"All this talk of weapons of mass destruction does not take into account that the sanctions are a weapon of mass destruction," said Yasser Aman, a fifth-year cell and molecular biology student.

Aman said he came to the rally to be a "voice of the oppressed."

Despite the heavy drizzle at times, protesters formed a line along Wilshire Boulevard, holding posters and banners as they chanted for the United States to get "out of the Middle East." Police watched from a distance while some protesters went out into the traffic to take their message to drivers.

CHARLES KUO/ Daily Bruin
A protest to condemn military action against Iraq was held in front of the Federal Building in Westwood.

Protesters questioned the motives for possible military strikes, which could take place after a week if the Iraqi government does not allow full inspection by the United Nations.

"This is a cover for the U.S. to install a new leader in Iraq who will do what the U.S. wishes and turn over the oil," Wood said.

Another demonstrator characterized the thinking behind a military strike as "cowboy thinking."

The protesters focused on the well being of civilians, not a defense of Iraqi President Saddam Hussein.

Dan Dickesen, a member of the Socialist Workers Party, said that one day the people of Iraq should make Hussein face justice, but that this is not a job of the United States.

In response to President Clinton's speech, Yousef Elia Haddad, a resident of the San Fernando Valley, said, "we don't buy his reasoning. There is a double standard when the resolutions against Iraq are so strictly enforced while resolutions against Israel are not."

Rather than bombing Iraq, protesters offered alternatives to the current policy. Along with the idea that the United States should end all activities in the area, one protester thought stronger relations could improve the situation.

"The U.S. should intensify contact with Iraq and become acquainted culturally. We should learn from each other and modify our and behavior and theirs," said Katherine Anderson, from Duluth, Minn.

Hartell also talked about using more humanitarian reasoning before using the military.

"If people thought that those in the third world were equal to them, then they would have second thoughts. This is racist," she said.

U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan is currently planning a trip to Iraq to avert a military strike.

President Clinton insisted on Tuesday that full compliance by Hussein is necessary to avert a military strike. Clinton said that such a strike would be "significant" and seriously damage Hussein's capability to wage war.

COMMUNITY BRIEFS

Breslow named chair of public health board

Dr. Lester Breslow, an internationally recognized public health leader, has been named chairman of the Dean's Advisory Board of the UCLA School of Public Health.

As chairman of the committee, Breslow will lead a group of friends of the school who help raise money for various projects. The school has embarked on a $15 million effort to raise funds for a new building and other critical needs, part of UCLA's $1.2 billion fund-raising campaign.

He is a former president of the American Public Health Association, dean emeritus of the UCLA School of Public Health and the current chair of the Public Health Commission of Los Angeles County.

"My goal is to help the school and its friends focus on how they can best support teaching, research and service programs of a truly outstanding school whose impact on the public's health extends from Southern California to many of the most needy areas of the world," Breslow said.

Berkeley's tutorial program helps youth

UC Berkeley's educational outreach program, the Berkeley Pledge, has made advances in the mathematical aptitudes of students in the San Francisco Bay area.

The program, established in 1995, targets disadvantaged students and offers academic enrichment to facilitate future college educations. Students in grades K-12 in more than 40 San Francisco schools have shown improvement on standardized tests and exhibited more self confidence.

"At the start of the semester, my students had a low sense of self. By the end of the semester, the change I saw was remarkable," said UC Berkeley undergraduate and tutor Michele Hamilton.

High school students participating in the math programs earned grade point averages that were nearly one point higher than their peers who were not enrolled.

The success of the Pledge's math program has prompted the launch of programs to improve students' reading and writing skills.

Richard Avalos stated, "(The Pledge) counters the inner city pool of negativism. ... It says to them, 'Si se puede.'"

University police say tactics surprised them

Students protesting the end of affirmative action in admissions and hiring policies sought physical confrontation with university police in UC Berkeley's Sproul Hall last year, according to police.

A confidential report obtained by The Daily Californian stated that aggressive movements by the students caused surprised officers to react without regard to police guidelines.

Protesters used tactics police said they had never seen before, including securing doors to the campus administration building with U-shaped bicycle locks and using a "ground-fighting" approach when confronting officers.

The students' combative behavior "surprised" police, who then reacted with a flurry of baton blows against the protesters after they attempted to crash their way through police lines.

"(Using the bicycle locks) meant that everyone on the first floor was trapped," said UC police Capt. Guillermo Beckford, the commanding officer at the time of the incident. "Public safety was in severe danger. We had not seen that tactic used before."

The report, written by attorney Gregory Fox at the request of the university's police review board, said an internal review by the department acknowledged that officers were not ready for such aggressive actions.

Members of the review board said that if the protesters' actions were unexpected, officers should have stuck to written policy.

He's so ... nice

Women claim to be searching for the perfect man, but what exactly are they looking for?

By Marco Ponce Contreras
Daily Bruin Contributor

"Bill, you are so nice. Couldn't we just be friends?" How many times have guys heard these words? Once, twice, maybe more times than one would care to admit.

Across college campuses nationwide, something persists which strums the backbone of a man's dignity. Whether it afflicts them or makes them better, some guys have the dubious distinction of carrying the title of "The Nice Guy."

Do women want a "macho man" or a "nice guy?" Several UCLA students were given the opportunity to answer that question.

Ramon recalls being a "nice guy" since junior high. It all started way back when he asked his mom about a certain girl he was interested in. "Mom, do you think she is attractive?" Ramon asked. Her reply, "Ramon, every woman in this world is pretty and attractive. There is no such thing as an ugly woman."

Today Ramon, 24, is a senior majoring in Latin American studies who keeps women in high reverence because of his down-to-earth values his mother bestowed. "She taught me to respect other people," Ramon says.

Another student brings a woman's point of view to the issue. A female student, De La Torre, who asked not to be identified by her first name, a 22-year-old economics student in her first year at UCLA, says, "usually the nice guys are the ones that know how to respect women."

When speaking of mothers, one major clue De la Torre looks for when meeting a man is how he treats his mom.

When he was 7 years old, Ramon lost his father and was brought up by his mother. Ramon learned the values of responsibility from taking care of his three younger brothers and sister while his mother was away working a day job.

When you come down to it, there are two overriding factors that navigate Ramon's ship through the sea of relationships. First, he says, it depends on the individual. He claims that if he did anything wrong, he wouldn't be able to think straight. It would be on his conscience. The second factor is family.

> "A woman likes a guy that gets her attention."
> De La Torre
> First-year economics student

Hal Pruett, psychologist and director of Psychological Services for 13 years, is aware of nice guys who complain that, "I'm a nice guy, I treat women with respect, and it doesn't seem to get me anywhere."

The problem seen by psychologists in Student Psychological Services (SPS) most often is from the other side of the spectrum: women complaining of men not being respectful or responsible. However, Pruett notes women are just as likely to date an authorative type as they are a passive guy.

What about the idea of women wanting to date macho, more aggressive guys than "nice guys?" Pruett believes women don't normally want to be with a "bad guy." If they do, it is because of problems in the home.

In abusive homes, patterns are formed which the children emulate as adults in their own families. "Sometimes love and abuse become connected, and distorted views sometimes get developed," Pruett said.

The choices people make in their partners are based on models when growing up. People learn from parents, relatives and television.

Despite what the psychologist or a textbook says, the consensus among some is that women do not like the "nice guy." Why? What is all the fuss over being wined and dined, spoiled mercifully, and pampered beyond oblivion? De la Torre has the perfect answer.

"A woman likes a guy that gets her attention, takes the initiative and makes her feel good."

Energetically, she emphasizes two main characteristics some women look for in a man. People want a challenge, someone who will not be an easy catch. The second reason comes in a blatantly cut-throat style about the stud: "everybody wants him, so you want to get him first."

Some women don't want a guy that's going to be a lap dog to their every whim. They want a man who presents a challenge and treats them with respect. In addition, they think they can change him to be a respectable man with high moral standards. However, many women find out the hard way that it is oftentimes futile.

In the early 1990s, the Journal of Personality and Social Psychology reported that women were attracted to dominant behavior in men. The sexual attraction was not linked to likability. Is this saying that women prefer a man who is aggressive?

Amaal Islam, 18, is a freshman majoring in neuroscience with two interesting stories of extreme contrasts. Her first boyfriend was a "nice guy." He did everything for her. "Before I would even ask for something, he would do it," she said.

For five months they were together without any fights or problems. As she put it, it got "boring."

Her second boyfriend was the opposite. Unlike the first, who was valedictorian in high school, this guy dropped out of high

Artist draws cash, Secret Service's attention

COUNTERFEIT: Creator of 'Boggs Bills' denied trial; 1,300 pieces of art seized

By Steven S. Woo
Cox News Service

WASHINGTON — Plenty of people draw a paycheck. But artist J.S.G. Boggs draws cash – currency so realistic that he spends it in stores and even gets change back.

That's why the U.S. Secret Service has hauled away his artwork, diaries and other belongings, including his underwear.

Between 1990 and 1992, the Secret Service raided his home three times, seizing more than 1,300 pieces of art. Each time, U.S. attorneys declined to prosecute, but the government still hasn't given Boggs his belongings back.

"I've been under investigation since 1986, and I would think that they would understand that I am an artist and not a criminal," Boggs said in an interview.

> "I've been under investigation since 1986 ... I am an artist and not a criminal."
> J.S.G. Boggs

Saying the Secret Service has seized "rugs, cakes, cookies and underwear with images of money on them," Boggs said the agents "seem to feel it is their province not only to protect the country from contraband, but against any image of money at all."

At first glance, the "Boggs Bills" in question are uncanny replicas of real U.S. currency. Drawn with fine-point pens in green and black ink, they are the same size and have the same delicate scrollwork and cross-hatching as genuine, engraved bills.

But on closer examination, subtle differences emerge. The reverse side of a $10 bill shows not the Treasury building, but the Supreme Court. The spiked seal on a $100 bill reads "Federal Observe Bank of Bohemia." And a $1,000 bill is signed by the "Secret of the Treasury" – J.S.G. Boggs.

What's more, the bills are inked on one side only, and many bear his thumbprint as well as his signature.

A spokesman for the Secret Service, Jim Mackin, said of the Boggs situation, "We enforce laws mandated by Congress and will continue to do so."

Under U.S. law, it is illegal to make

Experts uncertain of sunscreen effectiveness

CANCER: Researchers still vouch for preventive product but suggest adjusting habits to block rays

By Daniel Q. Haney
The Associated Press

PHILADELPHIA — A provocative presentation at a science conference Tuesday questioned the widely held belief that sunscreens lower the risk of deadly melanoma skin cancer, but specialists still caution against going into the sunshine without these lotions.

Sunscreens prevent sunburns, and since there is evidence that frequent burns, especially at an early age, trigger melanoma, many experts assume that using them should help ward off this cancer.

However, melanoma cases have risen dramatically over the last 25 years even as sunscreen use became more common. The lethal cancer now strikes about 42,000 Americans a year, killing 7,300.

Dr. Marianne Berwick, an epidemiologist at Memorial Sloan-Kettering Cancer Center in New York City, said her own study, as well as a review of other research, offers no convincing evidence that using sunscreens keeps people from getting melanoma.

"It's not safe to rely on sunscreen," she said.

Ten studies have looked at the question, she said at the American Association for the Advancement of Science meeting. Three of them, including her own, found no link between sunscreens and melanoma risk. Two suggested that sunscreens seem to prevent melanoma.

The five others found that melanoma risk actually increased among sunscreen users — probably because people who use them most are already at highest risk because of light complexions.

Several dermatologists strongly disagreed with Berwick's report.

Until there is clear proof that sunscreens are ineffective, "it would be irresponsible to discontinue all recommendations about using sunscreens," said Dr. Darrell Rigel of New York University.

Dr. Michael Thun, director of analytics epidemiology at the American Cancer Society, said: "People should not stop using sunscreen because of this study," he said. "The important message is that using sunscreen is only one of several measures to reduce one's risk of skin cancer."

Melanoma may take 20 years or more to develop after excessive sun exposure. Some doctors argue that it is simply too soon to prove that sunscreens are helping, since No. 15 and stronger sunscreens have only been in wide use since the mid 1980s.

Dr. Roger Ceilley of the University of Iowa, president of the American Academy of Dermatology, said most of the people getting melanoma now were exposed long before they began using sunscreens.

"I personally think it very likely reduces the risk of melanoma," said Ceilley. "I use it everyday and recommend it to my patients."

Dr. Jouni Uitto of Thomas Jefferson University said most skin specialists would agree.

"If you asked 100 dermatologists, 95 would say sunscreen protects against melanoma, and they counsel their patients that way," Uitto said.

Still, these doctors cautioned against using sunscreen as an excuse to bake in the sun. They said people at high risk of melanoma should avoid prolonged sun exposure, stay out of the midday sun and wear hats and long-sleeved shirts.

Generally, dermatologists agree with Berwick's contention that genetic susceptibility is the most important factor in melanoma. Her study, based on 1,200 people in Connecticut, found that fair-skinned people who burn easily are about six times more likely than darker folks to get melanoma. And people with many moles have about six times the risk of people with few of them.

Among Berwick's points:

·The belief that bad childhood sunburns trigger melanoma may be wrong. Studies show that only about half the people questioned repeatedly about blistering childhood burns consistently give the same answer.

·Many fair-skinned people may be using sunscreens so they can stay out in the sun longer without getting burned. Nevertheless, the excess sun exposure, even if it doesn't burn, may increase their risk of melanoma.

·Intermittent sun exposure, such as the occasional trip to the beach, may be more likely to cause melanoma than more regular time in the sun.

Universities, private firms cash in on faculty research

INVENTIONS: Critics fear schools will shift focus to most profitable ventures

By Jon Marcus
The Associated Press

BOSTON — Universities and colleges in the United States and Canada are cashing in on their faculties' inventions to the tune of more than half a billion dollars a year, according to a new report.

The University of California system alone made $63.2 million from licenses and patents, Stanford $43.8 million and Columbia $40.6 million.

University authorities point out that license fees and royalties from patents represent a fraction of the $21.4 billion a year in research conducted by the 173 universities and colleges surveyed.

The schools nationwide made $592 million from licenses and royalties in 1996, the last year for which the figures are available, said the Association of University Technology Managers in a report to be released on Wednesday. This is up from $495 million the year before and a 167 percent increase in five years.

This growth comes even as research spending by government and private industry has slowed and colleges and universities are seeking new ways to raise money.

"Look at it as a hard-earned windfall," said Marvin Guthrie, the association's president and vice president of patents and licensing at Massachusetts General Hospital. "You've got research, you've got the successful transfer of research information to a company; the company hires people. So there is a return all the way down: people hold their jobs, the investors make money, some of the money goes back to the university in the form of royalties, and everybody benefits."

But critics worry that closer ties between academia and the private sector may transform universities into industrial laboratories, focused only on potentially money-making research.

They worry some schools may soon put pressure on their research faculties to focus on those areas most likely to produce a profit.

"Money is a pretty strong driver, and as the money gets bigger, the push to get more involved in things that have a potential for making big money gets stronger and stronger," said Jules LaPidus, president of the Council of Graduate Schools.

> "There's nothing wrong with capitalizing on the results of research."
> Jules LaPidus
> Council of Graduate Schools president

"There's nothing wrong with capitalizing on the results of research, but we have to be careful that the university doesn't turn into the development arm (for industry). These figures are one indication that there's been movement in that direction."

Collectively, American and Canadian colleges and universities awarded a record 2,741 licenses to private industry to develop products based on their research.

The schools applied for 3,261 patents, up 11 percent from 1995.

Royalties and revenue from licenses is usually split between the departments in which the discoveries were made, the university and the inventors.

Faculty who work with private industry are not normally prevented from sharing the results of their research, though some are required to allow their private industry partners to review the data first.

China Airlines plane explosion leaves 203 dead

CRASH: Authorities still unable to discover cause of worst wreck in Taiwan

By Annie Huang
The Associated Press

TAIPEI, Taiwan — Investigators reconstructing the route of China Airlines Flight CI 676 focused Tuesday on why the jet veered off a seemingly routine approach at the last moment, crashing and exploding into flames just short of the runway.

It was Taiwan's worst plane crash, killing 203 people — everyone on board, including at least four Americans and seven on the ground — and destroying a string of homes near Taipei's airport Monday.

Soldiers, police and firefighters picked through shoes and engine parts Tuesday, looking for remains and personal items to help identify the victims. Cries of grieving relatives mixed with Buddhist funeral chants at a blue-and-orange tent nearby.

Most of the dead were tourists returning home from the resort island of Bali, but Taiwan's respected Central Bank governor, his wife and four other finance officials also were aboard.

Dazed by his loss, Chien Ming-hsing looked Tuesday for the remains of 13 relatives, including his son, daughter and his grandchildren. They were vacationing together in Bali.

"I don't know how we'll handle things," he said.

Although the plane crashed in fog and light rain, investigators were looking elsewhere for a cause. Initial information suggested that despite the weather, the veteran pilots had been on a routine landing until just before the accident.

Flight data records had been recovered and sent to the United States for analysis, airport officials said.

A recording of cockpit conversations with the control tower indicated that the pilot of the twin-engine Airbus sought permission to land when the jet still was on course.

He then lost touch and did not answer a question about whether he would try a second approach. The recording offered no information to confirm reports from the airline that the pilot was trying a second approach when the plane crashed.

Two beeps were then heard on the India's voter turnout high despite violence

ELECTIONS: Government officials declare success for budding democracy

By Hema Shukla
The Associated Press

NEW DELHI, India — Indians voted in large numbers despite bomb explosions and shootings during parliamentary elections, prompting government officials and analysts to declare today that the world's largest democracy is thriving.

More than 55 percent of registered voters turned out Monday to elect 222 deputies in the first phase of staggered voting, similar to turnout figures in previous elections. It will take five more days of balloting to complete the elections for India's 545-seat lower house of parliament.

"In the turbulence of a maturing democracy, the elections are a resounding success," said B.G. Verghese, political analyst at the Center for Policy Research.

Highway funding bill tied in with affirmative action issues

CONGRESS: Parties differ in opinion over money distribution to minorities

By Darlene Superville
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — At stake are billions of federal dollars for highways and mass transit — spending that Congress overwhelmingly supports. Yet the money could become entangled in one of the nation's touchiest political issues: affirmative action.

One provision of the current huge highway program steers at least 10 percent of the money to firms owned by minorities or women. But it faces growing opposition in the Republican-controlled congress.

While Republicans are not united on the issue, the 1996 GOP platform put the party on record against racial and gender preferences. Adding strength to the move was California's 1996 vote to ban race or gender from being a factor in state hiring or college admissions.

The strength of the movement against affirmative action will be tested more than once during the current session of Congress.

Other civil rights issues on the congressional table this year include President Clinton's call for an $86 million spending increase to enforce the country's civil rights laws and his naming of Los Angeles attorney Bill Lann Lee to the Justice Department's top civil rights post. Legislation to outlaw job discrimination against gays is also pending.

Rep. Charles Canady, R-Fla., and other conservatives, citing more than a dozen proposals to end state affirmative action programs, say the public is turning against "a system that reinforces prejudice and discrimination in our society."

Treasury bills fall to lowest in three weeks

WASHINGTON — Interest rates on short-term Treasury bills fell in Tuesday's auction to the lowest levels in three weeks.

The Treasury Department auctioned $10.9 billion in three-month bills at an average discount rate of 5.075 percent. Another $11.3 billion in six-month bills was auctioned at an average discount rate of 5.070 percent.

The three-month rate was down from 5.095 percent last week and was the lowest since 5.070 percent Jan. 26. The six-month rate was down from 5.075 percent last week and was the lowest since 5.025 percent on Jan. 26.

The new discount rates understate the actual return to investors — 5.213 percent for three-month bills with a $10,000 bill selling for $9,871.70, or 5.275 percent for a six-month bill selling for $9,743.70.

In a separate report, the Federal Reserve said Monday that the average yield for one-year Treasury bills, the most popular index for making changes in adjustable rate mortgages, rose to 5.28 percent last week from 5.26 percent the previous week.

Ruling seen as setback for gay rights in Europe

BRUSSELS, Belgium — Gay rights activists were shattered by a European Union (EU) high court ruling today against a British lesbian railroad clerk who sought travel benefits for her girlfriend.

It had been considered a test case on workplace equality for homosexuals across Europe.

"We're gutted. It's unbelievable that in this day and age, we have a judgment that means that lesbians and gays effectively have no rights in the workplace," said Anya Palmer of the British gay rights group Stonewall.

The European Court of Justice in Luxembourg said Britain's South West Trains did not violate EU law when it said the girlfriend of booking clerk Lisa Grant was ineligible for travel benefits available to the partners of heterosexual employees.

Lawyers for the couple, including Cherie Booth, wife of British Prime Minister Tony Blair, argued the policy violated the EU's treaty, which guarantees "equal pay for equal work without discrimination based on sex."

The rail company argued that the clause did not cover sexual orientation. South West Trains also denied free travel benefits to partners of male homosexuals.

Jill Percey, Grant's partner, said they and their supporters would campaign to have laws changed in Britain to outlaw discrimination based on sexual orientation. Blair's government is committed to reforms ending discrimination against gay workers.

The EU's executive agency said it was considering changes to its law to "plug the gaps" in anti-discrimination clauses. Any new proposals would need backing from the 15 EU nations.

Roma woman drowned in skinhead attack

PRAGUE, Czech Republic — Police pulled the body of a young Gypsy woman from the Elbe River on Tuesday, two days after three skinheads allegedly pushed her from a bridge.

It was the third attack in four weeks on gypsies — who prefer to be known as Roma — in the Czech Republic.

Police spokesman Karel Matula said the 26-year-old woman apparently was attacked shortly before midnight Sunday on a bridge in the east Bohemian town of Vrchlabi, 75 miles northeast of Prague.

Firefighters had to rescue another woman who jumped in the river to try to help retrieve the victim. The victim's body was finally recovered Tuesday.

Three suspects, ages 23-24, were detained Monday and remain in custody.

Badge misuse puts policy into question

AUTHORITY: Top officials' abuse of power prompts limits, ban on decal issue

The Associated Press

The practice of issuing police-style badges to public officials is drawing fire from critics who call it an invitation to abuse.

Citizens of suburban West Covina were outraged last month when they learned Mayor Ben Wong had flashed his city-issued government badge and confiscated a motorist's driver's license after a fender-bender traffic accident in 1996.

"It wasn't the brightest thing to do," Wong admitted.

In Los Angeles, the City Council was expected to vote this week on a recommendation to limit its badge policy in the wake of a 1996 scandal involving Building and Safety Commission President Scott Z. Adler.

Adler resigned and later pleaded no contest to charges of soliciting a prostitute after allegedly using his badge to intimidate her.

Such abuses, while considered rare, have prompted some experts to question the wisdom of issuing the shield-shaped metal badges to public officials with few, if any, law enforcement duties.

"They are often used to get away with benefits, whether to intimidate somebody or get special favors," said Michael Josephson, president of the Josephson Institute of Ethics of Marina del Rey.

In Los Angeles, a report found that 1,720 city badges were in the hands of non-sworn employees and officials in 1996, ranging from building inspectors to firefighters. Of those, about 90 badges – mostly issued to members of various commissions – were not sanctioned by the City Council.

Supporters say the badges are a useful way of quickly establishing authority.

"Police commissioners and fire commissioners on occasion go in the field and need to identify themselves," said Clifford Weiss, acting executive director of the civilian Los Angeles Police Commission.

Critics feel otherwise.

"They are a door to trouble," said Hubert Williams of the Washington-based Police Foundation. "It creates a perceived protection from the law."

Los Angeles County overhauled its badge-issuing policy in 1980 after finding that "Hillside Strangler" serial killer Kenneth Bianchi had been given a county seal decal by a supervisor's deputy chief. He later used it in his car to pose as a police officer when luring his victims.

The Board of Supervisors passed a motion to ban the decals and to severely limit the number of official badges – although the supervisors excluded themselves from the ban.

In response to the accusations against Adler, City Councilman John Ferraro has introduced a motion calling for limits on the badges issued, and a council committee last week approved recommendations for the drafting of ordinances that would require a streamlined badge-issuing and review process.

Some police officials say limiting badges is a good idea.

"Badges belong to cops," said Glendora Police Chief Paul Butler.

New privacy act targets celebrity chasers

By Jennifer Bowles
The Associated Press

Paparazzi who chase celebrities and make them fear injury would be committing a federal crime under a law proposed Tuesday. The law was immediately condemned by civil rights activists, who labeled it unconstitutional.

U.S. Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif. and colleague Orrin Hatch, a Utah Republican who is chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, said they plan this month to introduce a bill outlawing some tactics used by photographers if the photos are intended for sale.

The so-called Personal Privacy Protection Act specifically would bar "persistently following or chasing a person in a manner that causes them to have a reasonable fear of bodily injury."

Violators would face up to a year in federal prison, at least five years if bodily harm actually results and at least 20 years if a death occurs.

The bill, which follows much-criticized chases of Princess Diana and actor Arnold Schwarzenegger, isn't limited to celebrities. However, it is aimed at ensuring their safety by curbing "abuses, threatening behavior by some who do not respect where the line is between what is public and what is private," Feinstein said at a news conference at the Screen Actors Guild.

"Just because a person makes their living on television or in some other public arena should not mean they forfeit all rights to personal privacy," she said in an earlier statement.

The Hollywood community applauded the idea.

"Civility is really hard to legislate. So until then, this bill represents a huge step forward," said Paul Reiser, co-star of TV's "Mad About You."

SAG President Richard Masur said many celebrities had expressed their support of the act, including Antonio Banderas, Tom Cruise, Whoopi Goldberg, Goldie Hawn, Billy Crystal, Tom Hanks and Brooke Shields.

Critics, however, said the proposed bill violates photographers' First Amendment rights and is redundant since there already are laws against trespassing, stalking and reckless driving.

"This is just grandstanding, it's absolutely unnecessary" said Ramona Ripston, executive director of the American Civil Liberties Union of Southern California. "People who overstep the bounds are already prosecuted under state laws."

For instance, two photographers were convicted earlier this month of misdemeanor false imprisonment for using their car to box in Schwarzenegger's Mercedes-Benz in an effort to videotape him and wife, Maria Shriver, outside their son's pre-school last May. The photographers, who are scheduled to be sentenced Monday, were hoping to get the first pictures of Schwarzenegger after he underwent heart valve surgery.

Perhaps the most controversial incident involving paparazzi occurred in August when Princess Diana, her boyfriend Dodi Al Fayed and their driver were killed in a Paris crash while being chased by photographers.

It turned out the driver of Diana's car was drunk and driving at excessive speeds.

While the media's role is unclear in Diana's death, "the mere fact that people recognized that she had been harassed by an overly aggressive media demonstrates the seriousness of the problem," Hatch said at the new conference.

school. She did everything for him. After nearly a year of putting up with his possessive nature and questions of who she was with and where she was going, she left him.

Today, Amaal is wary of who she dates. She would like to meet someone with both attributes. She wants someone who will argue with her. She strongly believes arguing is a strong indication that someone cares about you.

She told a story of her roommate. She noticed her roommate complaining about a lab partner: "Oh, my God, I hate him. He's so bad." A quarter later, she speaks of her former lab partner in pleasant terms. Amaal sees them arguing constantly, and her roommate really likes him.

As reported earlier in the Journal of Personality and Social Psychology, a study was conducted to test the effects of dominance on women. Seventy-four male and female students from an upper division psychology course participated in the study.

In the test for dating desirability, it was shown that "female attraction was an interactive function of male dominance and agreeableness."

It seems as though many women want a man that takes initiative and is aggressive, but not domineering. They want someone who is confident and carries himself in a dignified and respectful manner. At the same time, they wouldn't mind a gentleman.

illustrations in the "likeness and similitude" of U.S. currency unless the illustrations are larger or smaller than real bills or are rendered in black and white.

Boggs said he created his first bill in a Chicago restaurant in 1984. The waitress mistook a drawing for a genuine $1 bill, and even after realizing her mistake accepted the bill as payment for a coffee and doughnut and gave him change, he said.

Since then, he has spent tens of thousands of "Boggs Bills" all over the world.

Boggs, 43, considers himself a performance artist. Getting people to take his art in place of money is the point of his performance, he said.

He says he never tries to deceive people that his bills are genuine and complains that the government has not taken proper procedures in dealing with his case.

He has sued the government to protect his First Amendment rights to draw his bills and to have his possessions returned, but his suit was dismissed last year by U.S. District Judge Royce C. Lamberth in Washington.

"I've been found guilty of a crime without the benefit of a jury trial," Boggs said. "In the last instance, we asked to present the case to the judge himself, and he wouldn't hear it."

He said the judge compared his work to "drugs and child pornography."

"He did not wrap his mind around the issues. He said if it looks like money it is counterfeit. Well, Monopoly money looks like money. Let's get a grip here," Boggs said.

> "(The judge) said if it looks like money it is counterfeit. Well, Monopoly money looks like money."
> J.S.G. Boggs

"He seems to think that anybody at all can see that my work is counterfeit, and I have only one question: if you are so confident that anyone can see that it is counterfeit, why is he denying me the jury trail that I deserve?" Boggs said.

Boggs' attorney, Kent Yalowitz of New York, agrees that "counterfeiting is a serious crime of fraud and cheating people, but to put Boggs in that category to begin with is inappropriate."

"He is not a defrauder; he has never defrauded anyone," Yalowitz said. "His goal is to elucidate and educate, not to deceive. And to put him in that category without a cross-section of the community deciding for themselves is morally outrageous."

Boggs is appealing the judge's decision not to give him his possessions back.

In the meantime, he continues to spend his bills. Just a few weeks ago in Manhattan, he said, he bought a six-pack of Rolling Rock beer with a $10 Boggs Bill and the clerk gave him $2.50 in change.

For his art, Boggs has endured years of trouble.

In 1986, he was arrested in England for counterfeiting but was acquitted after a five-day jury trial. One of the drawings of English currency at the center of that case is now in the British Museum, he said.

In 1989, he was arrested in Sydney, Australia. He said the judge threw out the case and gave him $20,000 for a wrongful arrest.

In 1990, he was the target of a raid in Tampa. After the U.S. attorney there declined to prosecute, Boggs thought his problems with the law were over and "was thrilled to get them off my back."

But then 12 Secret Service agents raided his apartment in Cheyenne, Wyoming, and seized the 1,300 items that he's still trying to recover.

Boggs studied art at Columbia University in New York in 1979 and was a fellow in art and ethics at Carnegie Mellon University in Pittsburgh from 1991 to 1993. However, he has never earned an academic degree.

Currently, Boggs is a research associate with the Center for the Advancement of Applied Ethics at Carnegie Mellon University, splitting his time between Tampa and New York.

> "He's right up front with anyone he presents notes to as payment ... He's letting them know that it is art."
> Craig Whitford
> Rare coin dealer

Boggs said he lectures, but he mainly performs. In his latest performance piece, called "Work Not Work," he moves a huge mound of dirt from one side of the stage to the other.

"During the process, I find various objects in the dirt and make comments. There's everything from an infant to a gun, drugs – you never know what is in that pile of dirt," he said.

He says the performance addresses the issues of what is work and what is not work, and how people make ethical judgments.

He performs at museums and universities around the country. His next performance is in Chicago in May.

Boggs said his main goal is eventually get his belongings back. His legal bills have skyrocketed to more than $800,000, he said, and "all indications are that the government has spent two to two and a half million dollars chasing me around, and I feel it is an unforgivable waste of money."

One of Boggs' defenders is Craig Whitford, owner of a rare coin auction company in Lansing, Mich., who said he has known Boggs for years and recently sold a $500 Boggs Bill for $5,000 to the Tampa Museum of Art.

"He's right up front with anyone he presents notes to as payment," Whitford said. "He's letting them know that it is art and that what he has done is part of a limited edition. He then just asks for the receipt and change. His art is about how people interrelate with each other and with money and ideas."

Whitford ridiculed the government seizure of some of Boggs' belongings.

"To take a man's boxer shorts ... " he snorted. "I'm sure if a person went into a bank to deposit some boxer shorts, don't you think they'd look twice?"

Queer Matters: Emerging Issues in Sexual Orientation Law: A symposium to provide students with the opportunity to learn about and discuss current issues in sexual orientation law. The symposium will include topics such as: transgender relationships, same-sex marriage rights, same-sex sexual harassment, sexual orientation bias in the legal profession, and employment benefits for same-sex partners. Panelists will include professors, practitioners and community activists. Presented by: the UCLA Women's Law Journal. Sponsors include: Center for Student Programming, UCLA School of Law LBGA, UCLA School of Law Student Bar Association, Law firm of Irell & Manella, LLP and the UCLA Women's Resource Center.
Saturday, March 7 9:30 am - 5:00 pm UCLA School of Law

Clothesline Project: A visual display that bears witness to the violence against women. During the public display, a clothesline is hung with decorated shirts representing a woman's survivorship. Survivors are encouraged to create a t-shirt to break the silence. Significant others are also welcome to create a t-shirt in memory of or on behalf of someone in their life who has experienced such violence. The first organizational meeting will meet on March 3, 1998 at the Women's Resource Center (2 Dodd Hall). If you are interested in being involved with this project please contact Robin McDonald @ the WRC, 206-6915

WRC facilities are accessible to students with disabilities, for more information please call 825-3945 or TDD 735-2929. WRC is a division of Student Development and Health.

ple. (We) are solving other people's communication problems. Therefore, it is becoming of us to know something about other things that go on in the world," he added.

In addition to working with students on campus, Chermayeff will be giving a public lecture and walk-through of an exhibition in mid-March featuring his recent mural project of over 1,000 square meters, "Tiles of the Oceans."

He blended the classic Portuguese tile with the computerized process of digital imaging to produce the gigantic tile wall at the Lisbon Aquarium.

The 55,000 tiles were individually hand-painted, each representing an abstract design that bears no distinct relation to the overall subject of the oceans of the world.

"If you step back, it's a photograph (of ocean creatures). If you are up against it, it's a wild abstraction of blue and white," Chermayeff said.

The Lisbon Aquarium was recently constructed as part of EXPO '98 and is the largest in Europe. Chermayeff, who studied at Harvard University, the Institute of Design in Chicago, and graduated from Yale University, School of Arts and Architecture, owns a firm in New York that has created a number of logos for large enterprises that are now much like household images in America.

His exhibition and graphic designs have won awards from numerous places including the American Institute of Graphic Arts, the Type Director's club, and the Society of Illustrators. In addition, he received honorary doctorates in fine arts from the Corcoran Gallery of Art (Washington, D.C.) and the University of the Arts (Philadelphia).

In the future he will be working on projects at the Smithsonian museums.

southern Andhra Pradesh.

At least four boys were killed by a bomb blast today in the southern town of Coimbatore, police said. The boys were playing cricket in a neighborhood park dominated by Muslims when they opened a bag containing the explosive. Explosions in the same town killed 54 people Saturday.

In the northern state of Punjab, 20 political activists were injured today in fighting between armed members of the governing local Akali Dal Party and the influential Congress Party.

The voting went ahead in as many as a quarter million polling stations. Polling will have to be scheduled again in several hundred districts because of violence or other problems. More than 600 million Indians were registered to vote in the staggered ballot, choosing from among some 5,000 candidates from more than 100 political parties.

In the remote northeastern Tripura state, where an ongoing insurgency and decades of ethnic conflict has claimed hundreds of lives, turnout was 85 percent, officials said. In Assam – where a banned separatist group, United Liberation Force of Assam, threatened violence if voters ventured out – turnout was 43 percent.

"People defied the boycott call," said Assam Chief Minister Prafulla Kumar Mahanta.

Violence did have an impact. In 1996, about 69 percent of the electorate voted in Assam. In Tamil Nadu, where a series of bomb blasts Saturday killed 54 people and injured nearly 200, only 45 percent of the electorate voted Monday.

Bhaskar Rao at the Center for Media Studies said turnout was also affected by apathy from voters who believe the elections will only result in another deadlocked parliament.

Elections were called three years early after 1996 voting resulted in no party winning a majority in parliament. Politicians tried and failed to form an enduring minority or coalition government.

The Congress Party, which has governed India for all but five years since independence, has been battered by accusations that it is corrupt and out of touch. The Hindu nationalist Bharatiya Janata Party is expected to win the most seats in these elections, but not the majority needed to govern alone.

tape. Chang Kuo-cheng, Taiwan's deputy director of civil aeronautics, said they could have been from the plane's warning system.

Chang said the plane touched ground off the runway, hit a utility pole and a highway median about 200 feet from the runway. It then skidded into several houses, surrounded by fish farms, rice paddies, factories and warehouses, and exploded.

A resident near the airport told a radio station that he saw the jetliner apparently preparing to land, "as if the pilot mistook the spacious highway for the runway."

The impact and blast left few pieces of the plane still recognizable – parts of a tail and a wing on one side of the road, and three large pieces of fuselage on the other.

In Washington, the State Department confirmed that the victims included four Americans. Susan Stahl, spokeswoman for the American Institute in Taiwan, the U.S. office on the island, said there might have been up to six U.S. citizens on the plane, but would not provide details until their identities were verified.

However, the identities of two of the Americans were released by their employers – Kenneth Cowan, a 35-year-old associate producer at WGBH-TV in Boston and Chris Corey, 28, a fitness trainer who worked in Boston.

Cowan had been in Bali scouting locations for the upcoming season of the "The Victory Garden."

Sheu, the bank chief, had been credited with helping keep Taiwan safe from the economic chaos gripping much of Asia.

Taiwan's Civil Aeronautics Administration ordered China Airlines, the country's flagship carrier, to ground its nine remaining Airbus 300 jets of the type that crashed.

Airline spokesman Hamilton Liu said flights would be canceled or consolidated until the planes pass strict inspections.

China Airlines was plagued for years with a reputation for poor service and a shoddy safety record but had largely kept a clean record since it launched a campaign to retrain pilots and retool its image after a 1994 crash in Japan that killed 264.

While the airline will have to pay compensation to family members of victims of Monday's crash, analysts say its real losses will come in shattered consumer confidence and nose-diving ticket sales.

HIRING

"The politicians in Washington still have not gotten the message from the American people that it's time for us to put an end to the divisive policy of preferences," Canady said.

Rep. Maxine Waters, the Congressional Black Caucus chair, said the failure of Canady's bill to clear the House Judiciary Committee on two previous occasions shows Republicans are struggling with the issue.

"I would not like to have to fight them but, should (Republicans) continue, I think we are going to win," Waters, D-Calif., said in an interview.

The first vote on the issue is likely to come in March or April on a proposal by Sen. Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., to kill the highway program's set-aside provision.

Last year, lawmakers extended the previous highway and mass transit funding bill until May 1 because they couldn't agree on how to distribute the money in new legislation.

McConnell said the "disadvantaged business enterprise" program is costly, divisive and unconstitutional. Instead, he wants states receiving federal transportation dollars to provide technical and other support to help "emerging small businesses" compete for transportation contracts. "This is one vote we will definitely have," he said in an interview.

Canady's bill failed last year due to objections from Rep. George Gekas, R-Pa., an affirmative action opponent who doubted Congress should try to end the programs when the courts increasingly are already doing so.

To satisfy critics who said Canady's original bill offered no suitable alternative, the lawmaker plans to introduce a new version requiring federal departments and agencies to make recruitment and outreach efforts.

Students deserve college town nightlife

WESTWOOD: Dancing permit a ridiculous demand to impose on city's businesses, younger taxpayers

Recently, a heinous crime was committed in Westwood. It was so serious that the West Los Angeles Vice Squad had to step in. It wasn't a shooting or robbery. It was worse.

People were caught dancing.

Every Friday or Saturday night, UCLA students look for some place to have fun. Many do not own cars, so their evenings are often limited to Westwood. Unfortunately, students have very little to do – one reason is that dancing is not allowed without a conditional use permit, which is very difficult to attain. The culprit: the Westwood Specific Plan.

The document sets the rules and regulations for commercial growth in Westwood. The current plan caps the number of movie seats and sets the height limits for new buildings at three stories. Los Angeles requires that all businesses which operate dance halls obtain a dance hall permit from the L.A. Police Commission. In Westwood, operators are also required to be approved for a conditional use permit for dancing. The plan allows "night clubs or other establishments offering dancing and live entertainment in conjunction with a restaurant, provided a conditional use permit is granted." However, obtaining this permit is very difficult.

Back in the late '80s, Westwood was a lively and exciting town. The atmosphere of dancing, night clubs, music and droves of students reflected Westwood for what it was – a college town. Increasing crime, riots and the shooting death of Karen Toshima in 1988 in Westwood led some concerned residents to take action.

The Westwood Specific Plan was updated in a response to the rising violence and gang activity. After the smoke cleared and the yellow tape was removed, Westwood reappeared – void of all life. Years later, Westwood is feeling the limiting effects of the policies: There's very little for students to do beyond eating, shopping and watching movies.

The village desperately needs to be revitalized, and strict regulations and obstacles do nothing but further drain life from the ailing town. Westwood has been home to tens of thousands of college students since the inception of UCLA in the late 1920s. Those residents who object to the loud, rowdy activity associated with college students should have thought twice about moving next to a university of over 35,000 students. Westwood is our home too, and we deserve a decent nightlife in the city.

The plan only serves to frustrate bored college students and hinder Westwood businesses' chance to survive. Residents are taxpayers, but students also pay taxes in addition to tuition. We should not have to suffer because of the conservative hostility from Westwood residents, and businesses should not be limited by silly regulations that accomplish nothing.

Dancing won't contribute to violence. Take Monty's in Westwood, for example. It offers live entertainment and dancing at night, and there's no violence. The plan tries to limit the number of establishments that offer dancing for no compelling reason. Students are ultimately affected by those stringent regulations.

Take a look at Westwood at night. The residents' complaints and regulations on Westwood's growth are harmful – not only are businesses feeling the sting, but students are, too.

The plan needs to be reformed to address the reality of students' being an inherent component of Westwood. Students largely keep the businesses – and Westwood Village – from completely withering. Yet when it comes to giving students what they want – a decent Westwood nightlife – the residents refuse to acknowledge our existence. It seems that some are forgetting that this is our town too. We deserve a college town where we can have fun.

Reading, not riches, the key to higher education

ADMISSIONS: Emphasis on SATs as root of equity problem is misguided

Hello again, everyone! Y'all enjoying those exciting midterms? Well, if calculus integrals and Spanish subjunctive verb tenses are flooding your brain, and you're searching for some mental Drano, look no further.

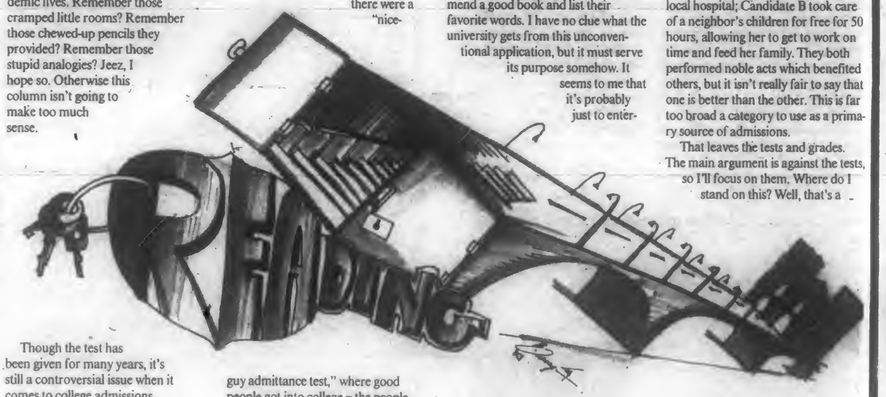
This doesn't relate to whatever you're studying, I promise you. Recently, one of my colleagues voiced the opinion that my previous column on Midnight Yell was printed at the wrong time, coming far too early in the quarter to be relevant. Well, sir, I must protest.

Brent Hopkins

You see, that was such a crucial issue in contemporary society. It needed to be printed right away. I mean, really, I don't think I could live with myself if I had let the mindless oppression of the yellers continue for even another day. The column was not early, because the voice of the people must always be heard, no matter what the date is ... or something like that. OK, OK, I don't have a compelling reason as to why there was a finals columns in the fourth week of school, but then again, I don't call the shots around here.

But enough of this quibbling. I would like to talk about another issue dear to my heart, one a tad more serious than yelling. I want to discuss the SAT. No, that's not a capitalization of Saturday, it's that test that almost all of us have taken at some time in our academic lives. Remember those cramped little rooms? Remember those chewed-up pencils they provided? Remember those stupid analogies? Jeez, I hope so. Otherwise this column isn't going to make too much sense.

Hopkins can't think of a clever tagline right now ...



Though the test has been given for many years, it's still a controversial issue when it comes to college admissions. Opponents of the test claim that it is culturally biased and discriminates against Latinos and African Americans. Others also claim that the test doesn't represent a student's true abilities, and that too much weight is placed on scores when it comes to admitting new students.

Time magazine published an article on the subject last November that brought up some interesting points. It showed students who fared poorly at the SAT and attended schools that did not require it as part of their admissions criteria. These students were able to do fairly well once at college. The article portrayed them as examples of why the SAT isn't the best indicator of a student's potential.

This is a sticky situation, no doubt. It would be nice if there were a "nice-guy admittance test," where good people got into college – the people who have the desire to learn and help their communities, but might not have the grades or scores. Unfortunately, there is no test, so there must be some other way of admitting people to college. That leaves us with grades; tests, such as the SAT and ACT; or "other." "Other" is the odd category used by some universities to try to gauge who the students are beyond their scores, and the category that SAT opponents claim is most important. Some schools want to know how the student has been active in his or her community. Others want to know what students do in their spare time, and still others ask odd questions which seem to have nothing to do with anything. Last year's application for Northwestern University asked applicants to write the menu for their ideal dinner, recommend a good book and list their favorite words. I have no clue what the university gets from this unconventional application, but it must serve its purpose somehow. It seems to me that it's probably just to entertain the admissions staff, weary after reading long, stupid essays for hours at a time.

Those "other" things are important, don't get me wrong. The problem with them is their subjectivity. Students list thousands of different organizations which they belong to and scores of ways they have served their communities. Universities can't evaluate each bit of community service and then use it to admit students. Obviously, some service is better than none, but they can't be expected to fairly assess what kind of service is more valuable for admissions purposes.

Suppose you have two candidates, equal in all categories except for service. Candidate A has 100 hours of volunteer service, filing papers at a local hospital; Candidate B took care of a neighbor's children for free for 50 hours, allowing her to get to work on time and feed her family. They both performed noble acts which benefited others, but it isn't really fair to say that one is better than the other. This is far too broad a category to use as a primary source of admissions.

That leaves the tests and grades. The main argument is against the tests, so I'll focus on them. Where do I stand on this? Well, that's a question I ask myself frequently. On one hand, my SAT scores helped me get into UCLA, so for that reason, I like the test. On the other hand, without affirmative action to help level the playing field, I understand where the critics are coming from. This isn't a cut-and-dry matter, any way you look at it.

When I listen to the argument that the test is geared toward affluent students, something doesn't quite add up.

When punishing criminals, less is not more

PRISONERS: Hard labor, tougher sentences the only way to inhibit crime

Thank God for small favors. After eight relatively tepid years as our state leader, Gov. Pete Wilson finally underwent one last bit of delayed embryonic development and acquired some guts.

Alex Balekian

Having nothing to lose because of his term limit, Wilson decided to get tough on incarcerated criminals in California's 33 prisons. The governor is releasing his final cloud of ink to convince us that the days of milk and honey in reformatories are no more. Much too little and far too late, I say.

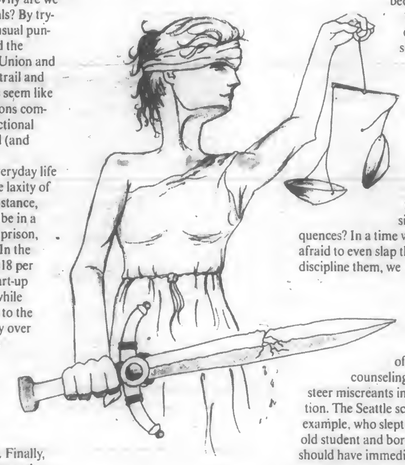
Assuming our soft-on-crime Democrat state legislature approves this new measure, prisoners will be denied the privilege of long, flowing hair, overnight conjugal visits, gym equipment, law reference books and other amenities provided to them by the friendly staff at the Department of Corrections. Convicts may soon kiss their ponytails and free weights goodbye.

Balekian is a third-year physiological sciences student who is still looking for parking. E-mail him at alexbmd@ucla.edu.

And for good reason. Why are we so gentle with our criminals? By trying to avoid cruel and unusual punishment, we have followed the American Civil Liberties Union and its likes far off the beaten trail and become lost. Prison terms seem like veritable Hawaiian vacations compared to the proper correctional experience that they could (and should) be.

Drawing parallels to everyday life helps paint a picture of the laxity of our prison systems. For instance, in the workplace, you can be in a 6-by-8 cubicle, whereas in prison, you are in an 8-by-10 cell. In the real world, I have to pay $18 per month plus an ungodly start-up fee in order to work out, while prisoners have free access to the same equipment. I will pay over $40,000 for my bachelor's degree here at UCLA (provided I can graduate in only four years), while the local drug pusher can peruse an extensive reading and reference collection gratis. Finally, the last straw for those of you who don't commute: Living in the cramped dorms and buying meal plan tickets that barely cover the cost of a stale, three-day-old blueberry bagel will empty your bank account and then some; while you can get free room and board and three square meals a day near Chino.

All of these luxuries, and you don't have to work for them. Being a bit more careless next time you smoke out can open the door to this exciting new world. It's no wonder that parolees have high violation rates since they see that the outside world is more of a burden and heartache than the concrete walls of prison.



We can fix this by bearing down on prisoners and criminals with very little sympathy. Why does wanting to regulate prisoners' hair or barring frequent sleepovers with their molls become such a newsworthy event when it should have been done long ago? Shouldn't we punish convicts harshly to reform and prevent them from repeating their misdeeds, for fear of facing similar consequences? In a time when parents are afraid to even slap their children to discipline them, we have forgotten what it is to properly reform.

All too often, we settle for counseling and therapy to steer miscreants in the right direction. The Seattle schoolteacher, for example, who slept with her 13-year-old student and bore his child, should have immediately served her seven-year sentence instead of being released with continued psychiatric evaluation. Sure enough, she was caught again with the father of her child, with passports, baby clothes and thousands of dollars in a running car, apparently with hopes of fleeing with him. The only suitable punishment besides snuffing her life out in the gas chamber would be to have her sterilized to prevent any future childbearing.

This option may sound harsh, but it will undoubtedly deter anyone who would have any inclination of mimicking her actions. Why do we keep convicts in jail so that they can lay around idly, waiting to be paroled or released to ease the burden of prison overcrowding? What ever happened to the chain gang? What ever happened to putting criminals to work at producing some kind, any kind, of positive results for society? At present, our lenient prisons make purgatory look like eternal damnation in hell.

Prisoners have the right to work out constantly and build strong bodies. They also have the right to read an endless supply of law books to find the most minor technicality on which to be released. They have the right to receive unexamined packages from family members, usually containing a good dose of heroin where the nail file used to be. They have the right to spend unsupervised time with their sweethearts in a secluded room with a mattress. Not only have our prisons become crack houses and bordellos, but they are also the breeding ground for smarter and stronger criminals waiting to be paroled.

Then again, maybe we should let prisoners have the right to these amenities. Maybe we should be foolish libertarians and not subject them

Jelani McCoy's resignation late Saturday night is the best thing that has happened to the UCLA basketball program in the four years I have attended school in Westwood. He represents everything "bad" about the game today. First off, since the start of the 1997-1998 college basketball season, he has consistently been surrounded by a cloud of controversy. Our school has a long-running tradition of having one of the best college basketball programs in the nation. I cannot believe the UCLA athletic department almost allowed that reputation to be tarnished by some kid from San Diego, who has been treated like God since day one.

Secondly, let's address Jelani's alleged decision to enter the NBA next year, instead of finishing off his education at one of the finest institutions in the nation. He's just another perfect example of a guy who plays for the money, with no consideration for the fact that he is a role model to people all over the country. I actually hope he has a conversation with Latrell Sprewell or Steve Howe, so they can let him know how far trouble will get you, even when you have enough money to last you the rest of your life.

Finally, Jelani McCoy is a quitter! I hope none of America's youth looks up to someone like this because it is just the perfect example of what someone in his situation shouldn't have done. I know whenever I am down or not doing my best in a certain area of my life, I always say, "Ahhh, ... I'll just give up! That'll solve all of my problems!" If that were the case, 75 percent of UCLA's freshman class would drop out after their first quarter here.

Jelani, I wish you the best of luck with the rest of your life ... God knows you'll need it. I also hope you hit the weight room or just start going to In-N-Out Burger more often because you are going to have to put on a lot of pounds before the start of the next NBA season. The only thing you have in common with a center like Shaq is that you are both lousy free-throw shooters. Other than that, I see no reason why an established NBA team would want to draft an underweight player, who never averaged more than 11 points a game in his three years of college. I hope you are looking forward to being a reserve player for the Clippers, if you're lucky enough to land that job!

however. Supposedly, students who come from more wealthy backgrounds are guaranteed better grades because they are given extra help by professional tutors. My family is not swimming in money, but my parents were concerned with my education. They never paid for classes to instruct me on how to score higher on the tests, but they did make sure I knew the importance of doing well. At the time, I dismissed this as some bizarre conspiracy between my parents to ruin my social life and generally annoy me. Once I finished the test, I saw that maybe ol' mom and dad did know a thing or two.

Those pointing fingers also single out the fact that predominantly minority high schools do not perform as well on the test as majority schools, because of the lack of funds and parent booster money to support students. Speaking as a graduate of a high school where whites only made up 10 percent of the student body, I can say that this is not true either. Sure, the rich guys across town may have had pretty campuses, nice football uniforms and parking lots filled with BMWs, but that doesn't mean my school didn't offer a lot of programs for interested students.

From ninth grade on, we were pulled from class and inserted into PSAT and SAT prep classes, with our principal haranguing us about how important it was to do well on the test. Looking around the room, I didn't see a bunch of wealthy white people, I saw people from all backgrounds. There were far more "underrepresented minorities" than there were any other group.

I never found those sessions to be particularly helpful, but I'm sure they were useful to some of the people there. What was important to me was something quite different, something that anyone can use. If you're using this paper for something other than something to sit on, then you have learned it, too. Wow, I feel like Mr. Rogers, saying this. But hey, ol' Fred seemed to know a thing or two about life, so I guess I'll just roll with it.

The thing that did make a difference for me was something available to every man, woman, child and whatever other category you want to include in there: reading. No prep classes, no special schooling, no trips to Europe to study medieval history; it was books that made a difference. It's not like I had some better books just because of my race; they were found in the public library. You don't even have to be reading Shakespeare at age five to learn how to read well. I know I wasn't. I must have read every Hardy Boys mystery ever written, some several times, and I'd say (using one of those famed SAT analogies) that Frank and Joe are to good literature as chicken-fried steak is to fine cuisine.

What started at home as a good rainy-day pastime was cultivated in school. The books I read in school were not just "dead white guy" authors, they were written by men and women from all over the globe. We read South American short stories, New England poetry, medieval epics and slave history. I didn't like reading many of them at the time, but now I see that's what helped me get to college, not some self-impressed lecturer who droned on and on about analogies and critical reading.

If students want to improve their scores on any test, not just the SATs, they need only make a trip to their local library. You will be able to find what you need in the stacks there, not in an expensive class or flash-card game. Libraries don't check at the door for your race, and you've already paid for them with your hard-earned dollars in the form of taxes.

The SATs don't have questions

about culture, they have questions about common sense. There's nothing on there about which year of Dom Perignon goes best with swordfish, or who originally played the Phantom of the Opera. I have no idea what the answer to either is, and I didn't have to know them for the test. My scores turned out OK not because of something I'd learned from my "culture," but from things I'd read in books.

For those concerned with minority admissions now that Proposition 209 is in effect, I sympathize with you completely. I wish that there could be a more equitable solution for admitting minorities to college, one that would attempt to make up for the discrimination and inequality in society. I agree that things are not as fair as they should be and can't offer an easy solution, but I don't think that the SAT is the problem.

to any type of cruelty. Try convincing the widow of a store owner who was shot at point-blank range that the man who pulled the trigger should simply loaf around in prison with his luxuries while she wakes up every day to work twice as hard as before to keep the business running. Try to prevent a would-be juvenile delinquent from spray-painting a wall or stealing a bicycle when the justice system is powerless even to literally give him a slap on the hand.

Now see if you cannot accomplish the aforementioned tasks if prisoners are forced into hard labor for their crimes, if teenage gangsters are faced with breaking rocks or bearing the brunt of a paddle swung at very high speeds.

The state of Texas came under fire for killing a "reformed" female prisoner for a grisly double murder she committed a whopping 14 years ago. Opponents of the death penalty stated that the born-again Christian woman who was about to die was not the woman who committed those crimes. If Texas officials had killed her as soon as the verdict was handed down instead of giving her 14 years in prison to find Jesus, this would never have happened. Everyone would have rejoiced that a drug-addicted, maniacal murderer was dead. Put them out quickly and let God take it from there.

These ideas may be seem extreme because we have strayed so far from the ideal purpose of a prison. Halfway around the world, developed nations kill suspects and then hope that they really committed the crimes. Prisoners in other countries are carted into the desert to develop the arid land with hard labor and make it inhabitable for others. What debt is Charles Manson paying to society at this very moment besides being one impetus among many forcing prison wardens to thin out the prison population with early releases?

We should kill more murderers more often and let the violent bloodshed do its work on deterring other criminals. If the gas chamber or the electric chair is too cruel or too expensive to maintain, bring back the guillotine. Cut the cord and let gravity do its work in less than a second.

The justice system may involve a trial, but it also involves suitable punishment; that's why we've got a blindfolded woman with a balance and a sword gracing every courtroom in America. That sword has rusted and her right arm has atrophied from disuse. If the niceties in prison become few and far between, then we will have been on the right path in properly reforming prisoners for their crimes.

The Dance Hall Crashers know how to have a good time, bringing a youthful audience to its feet with their blend of punk, pop and ska

Rod Stewart comes close with "Forever Young." David Bowie's "Teenage Wildlife" almost hits it. Even Tony Bennett's "Young and Foolish" has the right idea. But no song can truly capture what Dance Hall Crashers truly embodies in their energy and vigor: the juvenile spirit.

On Feb. 13, the pop/punk/ska group Dance Hall Crashers (DHC) gave a stellar performance to their younger fans at The Roxy in Hollywood. Through a compilation of old favorites from their previous albums and a few new hits from their most recent album, "Honey I'm Homely," DHC gave their loyal followers a performance of electricity and compelling drives.

The audience, in return, made it clear that it didn't matter what was played, as long as DHC continuously fed them the vitality their sound is a trademark of. The Roxy on the chilly night before Valentine's Day was the place to shout, sing and have a blast.

Fans usually aren't sure what words describe DHC and their music. "Fast," "rockin'" and "awesome" come to mind, but as far as putting an adjective to their style ... fans are often left without a clue. Older fans would contend that their songs are strictly punk, but then again there are hints of ska influences. Their new album proves that their music has evolved into a more pop-style rock than, say, older albums like "Lockjaw" or "Old Record."

Since the band first emerged roughly seven years ago in Berkeley, they have found their own style and their own groove which is distinguished from rock's stereotypes. The two lead singers, Karina Denike and Elyse Rogers, use both unique harmonies and outstanding solo vocals to create mass appeal among their fans.

Wayans employs all senses to the max

FILM: Youngest brother follows older siblings' footsteps with first starring role in movie

By Aimee Phan
Daily Bruin Staff

Being the youngest in a family of 10 kids can be tough. Especially in a family full of comedians. Marlon Wayans, whose new comedy "Senseless" opens Friday, believes that while being the youngest does have its advantages, like learning from his older siblings' experiences and getting their advice, it mostly involves being the butt of everyone's jokes.

"In a normal family, I'd be the baby," Wayans says. "But in my family, I'm something that you would call a victim. Every joke is on me, basically. They were never mean to me, but they were comedians and their jobs were to make fun, and I was the butt."

But the jokes in the family soon became their formula for success in Hollywood. And the name "Wayans" became synonymous with edgy urban comedy. Led by big brother Keenan, who left college to try stand-up comedy, Marlon follows a long line of Wayans comedians who have found success in television and movies. The Wayans' impact on television is especially significant starting with the popular comedy-sketch show "In Living Color." The show was a family affair with Keenan as executive producer and siblings Damon, Kim, Shawn and Marlon as cast members. Their presence on television continues today with Keenan's late-night talk show and Shawn and Marlon's Warner Bros. Network show, aptly named "The Wayans Brothers."

Before the family hit it big in Hollywood, Wayans and his brothers and sisters grew up in New York City's lower-income Chelsea district where his mother worked part-time as a social worker, and his father was, as Wayans puts it, not an entrepreneur, but an "entre-poor-neur."

"He sold condoms and sunglasses and wonders why he's broke," Wayans says. "The only good days were sunny days when everybody's horny."

But Keenan's success as a comedian in Hollywood soon paved the way for many of his siblings to set their ambitions higher than most of the other kids living in the projects. Wayans remembers visiting his oldest brother in California and realizing that there was a life for him outside of the projects.

"That pretty much opened up my eyes to the world out there," Wayans says, "that there's not just the projects. In the projects, successful is the penthouse project apartment, and that's what people strive for. But Keenan broke us out of that mold by doing what he did."

In his new film "Senseless," Wayans plays a broke but ambitious Ivy-league college student who tries to support his family and stay in school by taking as many part-time jobs as possible. His character, so desperate for money, even volunteers for an experimental test drug that radically alters his five senses, which is where the movie takes off. Wayans says he sympathizes with his character's financial state, remembering his own odd jobs growing up.

"I've been working since I was 10 years old," Wayans says. "My first 'job' job was at a pizza shop, and I got paid $25 every two weeks and all the free pizza I could eat. So I was broke, bloated and constipated."

In the movie, Wayans uses his character's off-the-wall schemes to make money to push the comedic envelope with physical comedy, bathroom humor and racy jokes. Wayans says much of the humor was improvised and proved to be the funniest scenes in the movie.

"You can't set boundaries for yourself," Wayans says. "As a comedian, you want to be totally uninhibited. If you're inhibited, you can't be funny. You need a director who won't

'Out of Actions' sets out to provoke reactions

ART: Modern representations reject aesthetically pleasing exterior, address deeper issues

By Vanessa VanderZanden
Daily Bruin Staff

Sometimes modern art seems transcendental. Sometimes, it appears more real than actual life. Sometimes, it's just weird.

Take the exhibit currently showing at The Geffen Contemporary at the Museum of Contemporary Art in downtown Los Angeles until May 10. Titled "Out of Actions: Between Performance and the Object, 1949-1979," the exhibit revolves around process-centered art. That is, art which remains more concerned with how it found creation than its actual form.

A perfectly grotesque example of this concept exists in Paul McCarthy's 1974 piece, "Meatcake." This inclusion documents a performance he once gave, with eight pages of text outlining his actions and three photographs visually depicting them. The result is more than a little disturbing, yet infinitely intriguing.

He notes in the documents, "– threw up / – make myself white with maynase / in the corner threw up / – I will be inbarest / – tape my leg to my penis," and later, "shoving food in my crotch / – bending over and doing it so my ass is facing them / – pants are filled with food."

The accompanying pictures reveal McCarthy wearing a sea captain's cap and suit with his pants pulled down and his underwear overflowing with hamburger meat and catsup. A siphon runs from his mouth to his genitals, while food and vomit coat his face and soil his clothing. Meanwhile, the audience looks on in abhorrence.

Apparently, this representation provides a piercing social commentary on the proliferation of or lack of self-degradation in the world at large. Regardless, it plays the same role as road kill – you hate to look but can't take your eyes away.

In many ways, Robert Delford Brown and Rhett Delford Brown echo McCarthy's controversial subject matter in their 1964 piece, "The Meat Show." This work includes the life-size models of two slaughtered sheep and one pig hanging by ropes from their legs before a blood-stained parachute. The informative document to the left details how the pair of artists originally hung oodles of butchered beasts in a walk-in freezer in Greenwich Village and sold tickets to the event for 75 cents.

While this work reflects the atrocities apparent in man's lust to eat meat, it crosses the border between art and life. By taking a tour of a common slaughterhouse freezer, the artists force us to question the humanity of our own standard feeding practices. This re-evaluation of everyday reality shines through in many of the show's works.

For example, Ben Vautier's 1962 addition "Ben's Window," reconstructs the window front which Vautier inhabited when his piece originally appeared in a Minneapolis art center. The work reveals a variety of bedroom items including a bed, bureau and bedside lamp, with white-out labeling and comments on the collection of objects. For instance, "dirty water" dons the side of an old fish tank, "rotting meat with flies" decorates the side of a dingy bake pan, and "don't look at me" glares from the interior glass of a photo frame.

Consequently, Vautier provides a voice for inanimate objects and redesigns the silent world which we take for granted. Almost as an unintentional addition to this work, a regularly clanging drone fills the entire museum space from some eerie, unidentifiable piece. In this way, even the silence has a voice.

Likewise, Robert Morris suggests that there

Bob Marley and the Wailers, "The Complete Wailers 1967-1972 Part 1," (JAD) It looks like the Beatles' "Anthology" phenomenon has carried over to the reggae world. This three-disc collection is a must for serious reggae fans, as well as the curious and those devoted to the Wailers, the group reggae-legend Bob Marley fronted before embarking on a his successful solo career.

The three-disc set includes three separate albums, all of which sometimes carry different versions of songs on the other two (here comes the Beatles' "Anthology" comparison). The first album represented is the rare "Rock to the Rock" album, which carries the earliest incarnations of the Wailers (from 1967-68), which included Marley, his wife, Rita, and Peter Tosh and Bunny Wailer. Most of the songs take the popular "rock steady" reggae sound, which was a slower, rock-pop influenced style, and mixes it with many '60s harmonizing/vocal styles. You can see the impression American R&B, pop and Motown had on the Wailers with such tunes as "Treat You Right," "Chances Are" and "There She Goes," without sacrificing that distinct reggae sound.

The second album is the even rarer "Selassie is the Chapel" release from the 1968-1970 era. This album shares a lot of the "rock steady" and '60s American pop-music styles from the "Rock to the Rock" album, but with "Selassie," the Wailers start experimenting more with different sounds and rhythms. It almost sounds less like the traditional reggae we know of today. But the magic of "Selassie" comes in the Wailers' burgeoning spirituality and their discovery of the Rastafarian religion. Their passion for Jah, the god of the Rastafarians, shines throughout their positive music, which includes the title-track hymn, "Tread Oh" and "The Lord Will Make a Way." Included also is a cover of the Box Tops' "The Letter" (titled "Give Me a Ticket" here) and the Wailers' classic "Rocking Steady."

And the third record is simply titled, "The Best of the Wailers (1969-70)," the true highlight of this multi-disc set. Considered the first "concept" album of reggae, the record was actually a commercial flop at the time, but many reggae aficionados point to its influential relevance now. "Best of" comprises a more polished sound, thanks to the late Leslie Kong's production efforts, and displays the talents of stars-in-the-making, Bob Marley and Peter Tosh. The '60s pop music influences remain, but "Best of" offers a more "straight-up" reggae sound than the other two albums included in this set. The signature, optimistic anthems, along with such covers of such pop songs as Jr. Walker's "Hold On to This Feeling," the Archies' bubblegum hit, "Sugar Sugar" and another version of "The Letter," make "Best of" even more of an enjoyable listening experience than the rest of "The Complete Wailers."

This collection, as a whole, represents a satisfying and comprehensive history-in-song of the most influential reggae artists of the '60s and '70s. Reggae fans, as well as people interested in the culture, evolution and inspirations of the Jamaican-rooted music genre, will surely find "The Complete Wailers" delightfully impressive. Mike Prevatt A-

Pee Shy, "Don't Get Too Comfortable," (Mercury) Alternative pop-rock can often achieve great playful tunes but, at the same time, fall into the Sesame-Street syndrome of over-simplified melodies. In their second major label release, Pee Shy fine-tunes their bright, giddy sounds to create real pop-rock fun without resorting to cheesy nursery rhymes.

The first track and single of the album, "Mr. Whisper," shows exactly what the band is capable of, namely funky beat-happy rhythms and a cutely odd quirkiness in the female vocals. From bridge to chorus, the mood remains light and plain but not without talent. True, at times sappiness can get dull, but Pee Shy tends to stay away from static rehashing of the same tunes by creating dynamic songs. "Jad Fair" eases into an ethereal melody that carefully ponders "What is this space left to fill/ a bull's eye forever ..." A little abstract, but it takes a small but distinct step away from surface lyrics.

Faster beats excite songs such as "Much Obliged" and "Fear." Through their humorous tone, Pee Shy mixes both slow and fast acoustic-guitar beats for listeners everywhere.

It cannot be considered serious rock, but it puffs off sarcasm in a mature fashion. It's a relieving dose of mind-numbing picks for the midterm blues. Michelle Zubiate B

James Iha, "Let It Come Down," (Virgin) Yes, it's a little dopey. Yes, it's a little foofey. But what's wrong with being a gentle romantic in the midst of a cruel world? James Iha's first solo album, "Let It Come Down," veers from the usually disillusioned, embittered pieces found on his efforts with The Smashing Pumpkins. And though it might not be what one would expect from the hard-rocking guitarist, it remains a calm, sweet background to whatever make-out session you may have planned. Or moody bout with a lack of a sex life, as the case may be. Either way, the meandering pace of Iha's borderline sappy vocals in his down-home songs reflect a tenderness that, no doubt, will never break into the mainstream.

Regardless, the timeless lyrics on songs like "Lover, Lover" still manage to strike a chord, with Iha crooning lines like "Lover, darling, when you hold my hand / It's all I'll have 'til tomorrow." In many ways, "Let It Come Down" is just a bunch of love songs, like a '50s LP intent on turning chicks to jelly as they dream of their one and only. Though it may be a tad out of place in today's musical atmosphere of self-indulging pain junkies and poppy, feel-good, one-hit wonders, it remains a worthwhile listen. The plain and simple pieces hearken back to a more soothing era where it was okay to swoon about the illusion of love. Where it was okay to believe that things would work out. When idealism wasn't a four-letter word. Ah, Calgon, take me away! Vanessa VanderZanden A-

God Lives Underwater, "Life in the So-Called Space Age," (1500/ A&M Records) Increasingly, bands rely on an electronic fad to support their lack of talent or creativity. There are a few bands, however, that come out of synthesized madness to relieve fans with truly great hits. Most become a combo of both. Dabbling in techno-rock keyboards and electronic computer sounds, God Lives Underwater's third release proves both more appealing and well-constructed than other albums, but it still has its flaws.

Within the album, those computer sounds can either strengthen or create unnecessary background noise. For the most part, it's the former, but in cases such as in the song "Vapors," those sounds become excessive. "Vapors" has a great core, but its obnoxious digital intro and phony Beatles-ish ending weighs down its potential.

The album also forms many contrasts in quality between songs. At times its electronic overtones can create uneasiness and disturbing reactions, but at the same time can demonstrate probing and methodic melodies. Such is the case in "Rearrange" and "Can't Come Down."

The best song of the album "Happy?" is a combination of melodically touching lyrics and hauntingly ethereal rhythms. Its lyrics have that element of love-lost emotion that makes many of their songs moving such as "And I hope that you're happy/ At least one of us is/ I hope one day you'll see/ I need you to save me."

Songs such as "The Rush Is Loud," however, have real intense moments, but those odd generated mixes in combination with monotone vocals are far from appealing. "Life in" is a confusing jumble of great songs and geeky tunes. Michelle Zubiate B-

'Mrs. Dalloway' explores Woolf's duality

FILM: Vanessa Redgrave captures psychological nature of author's life

By Michelle Nguyen
Daily Bruin Contributor

The wave of recent British dramatic films has cloyed the public with a grossly sweet aftertaste. Maybe because these films have a packaged Americanness about them – complete with American leads and directors and the tar of Hollywood sentimentality that is dumped onto production.

But "Mrs. Dalloway," a film based on the Virginia Woolf novel, hopes to offer a panacea to this overdose of frilly pictures by changing the formula with the cream of English actors and filmmakers.

The film revolves around Clarissa Dalloway, who confronts the decisions she made 30 years earlier. In the the midst of 1923 London, she revisits her memories of long ago, when she was single, hopeful and on the brink of making important decisions. Her life is profoundly touched by Septimus Warren Smith (Rupert Graves), a young soldier emerging shell-shocked from World War I.

For those who love Virginia Woolf's writing, this film could be a glimpse into the psychological duality of Woolf herself, embodied in the characters of Mrs. Dalloway and Septimus. The character of Mrs. Dalloway glimmers of the "shy but snobbish" social butterfly side of which Woolf was very conscious. But Mrs. Dalloway and Septimus together represent the troubled author who suffered a series of mental breakdowns.

Fearing her own insanity and the coming of World War II, Woolf committed suicide.

"She put that in both Septimus and Mrs. Dalloway, who, from a very early age, was aware of a sort of lurking insanity," says Director Marleen Gorris.

Veteran actress Vanessa Redgrave brings her interpretation of Mrs. Dalloway's conflicting sensibilities to the screen.

First Look Pictures
Vanessa Redgrave stars as Mrs. Dalloway in this film adaptation.

A patient and easy Redgrave sits in the Four Seasons Hotel with the Los Angeles hustle down below. She attempts to describe her close relationship with the title character in "Mrs. Dalloway," which will be released on Friday.

"I feel so close to Mrs. Dalloway that I feel like I know her better than anybody," Redgrave says. The glaring, overcast sky frames her white-blonde hair. Her mirthful blue eyes look away when she speaks with the absolute involvement that radiates from a woman whose acting career has spanned a strong four decades.

"I have to really work hard to find out why I feel that close. I feel I know Mrs. Dalloway better than still I know my own daughters or my own mother," Redgrave continues.

The actress' passion for Woolf's genius is readily apparent as she exclaims, "I couldn't believe what a mind like that could do!"

She and the film's screenwriter, Eileen Atkins, would pore over Woolf's work in long, late-night discussions when working together on "Vita and Virginia," a play about Woolf.

That is where Atkins told Redgrave that she couldn't see anybody else playing the part of Mrs. Dalloway. But Redgrave is nothing like Mrs. Dalloway. In fact, she sees more simi-exists a space surrounding every individual being that, though invisible, takes a very solid form. Made in 1961, he calls his work "Untitled (Standing Box)."

It's a tall, unpainted wooden box. It's the height of the artist. When he stands in it, as he does in the picture next to the box, he is said to be "performing the box."

Continuing in this simplistic vein, one of John Cage's musical scores takes up several square feet of one of the museum walls. His piece details when the performer should "Pour water from receptacle to another" and play the "duck whistle in bowl of water (as long as breath holds – but not past)." With such careful instructions, it would seem difficult to mess up the piece.

> The entire display ... mostly just intrigues viewers with the very avant garde nature of its content.

Saburo Murakami's piece "Work," takes a slightly more confusing form. While the piece seems to only be made up of red and black peeling paint on a slab of wood, the "viewer is invited to interact with this work by listening to the interior clock that rings with different bells at unpredictable moments." Are the bells conceptual, only to be heard after hours of morphing with the visual intricacies of the textured piece?

Equally bizarre is Nam June Paik's "Integral Piano," which consists of three upright pianos. Though all appear somewhat haggard with age, the central instrument has wires spilling out of it as well as peculiar items glued to it. Examples include barbed wire, a bra, an alarm clock, a telephone, toy cars and egg shells. Beautiful is not the word to describe it, though it seems dubious that Paik's intentions remain grounded in receiving such common praise.

But who knows what reaction he expected? In fact, most of the works on display seem best experienced in live form, though the existing collection still manages to catch the eye. The entire display, despite its ability to express higher levels of consciousness, mostly just intrigues viewers with the very avant garde nature of its content.

So maybe most people won't really "get it." They'll probably walk around, gawking at the twisted pieces, utterly amused and more than a little baffled. But is that so terrible?

limit you and will let you go all the way and then pull you back a little."

Wayans got that with Director Penelope Spheeris ("Wayne's World," "The Little Rascals"), who encouraged the actors to bring ideas to the set and then included the best of them in the film.

"Penelope was great because she allowed me to improvise like I did," Wayans says. "I loved working with Penelope, aside from my brother. But that's family. It was the best experience I had working with the director."

The feeling is mutual for Spheeris who says that Wayans and the children in "The Little Rascals" have been her favorite actors to work with. Spheeris was especially impressed with Wayans' generous nature and friendliness with everyone around the set.

"He makes everybody feel good," Spheeris says. "He never complains, and he's funny as hell. He comes in the morning and gives everyone on the set a hug.

"You can't beat this kid. He's one of my favorite people I've ever met in my life, definitely my favorite actor I've ever worked with."

With "Senseless" being his first leading role in a film, Wayans is unsure whether he would want the kind of superstardom that actors like Eddie Murphy and "In Living Color" alumnus Jim Carrey have after making it big in comedic movies.

"I wouldn't mind making that kind of money but that lifestyle of not being able to go out in the public, you lose a part of yourself," Wayans says. "I take my hat off to them for just accepting that role. If that happens (for me), hey, as long as I work, I'm happy."

For Wayans, he is just happy to have a job he finally likes.

"It's not about the stardom or the money," Wayans says. "It's the fact that I wake up in the morning and I want to go to work. I love to go to work."

FILM: "Senseless" opens Friday.

larities between Mrs. Dalloway and her own mother. Like Redgrave's mother, Mrs. Dalloway is a woman who is by turns pure and strongly soulful.

"My mother's a very innocent woman coming from a country background where the women had longings to do things but didn't," Redgrave says. "My mother never had much of an education. ... She always felt a bit intimidated by (her husband) and his colleagues who had all been to university ... and who all had the means to evaluate works of art and literature and she hadn't. She had her soul and she did respond in a wonderful, uncomplicated and simple way."

Redgrave's familiarity with Mrs. Dalloway stems from the satori-like light bulb that comes from immersing oneself in art.

"I see a chameleon change color, but that's just a natural process. It doesn't involve the chameleon's mind, right?" Redgrave says. "But there are some works of art, and a character in a great novel is a great work of art, as well. As you go close, your mind comes up and merges with what the writer's written, your whole mind changes color and you become part of that, at least that's how I feel it.

"You stop talking about acting or preparing," Redgrave continues. "It just becomes part of you."

Redgrave is not only a storyteller but a listener, hungry for the journalists to engage her with their knowledge as much as she does in turn.

"I'm still very ill-read, so I depend on my meetings with people like yourselves," Redgrave admits. "I mean it was a journalist that actually said to me about a week ago, 'I think you should play "Long Day's Journey into Night."' I was very grateful for that."

Bassist Mikey Weiss, drummer Gavin Hammon and guitarist Jason Hammon complement the band's clean-cut image but, at the same time, uphold its sarcastic attitude.

Opening with a rivet of drums and screaming teenagers and 20-somethings, Dance Hall Crashers captured the crowd from the beginning. The first few songs of the set included old favorites that immediately pleased those fans of their punkier sound era.

Rogers and Denike confidently dominated the stage and took advantage of The Roxy's small club atmosphere to create a crowd/performer connection at every chance possible.

Rogers' cute, stylish black hair with bangs and Denike's floral skirt and blouse gave the two a distinct retro-esque image of quasi-innocence. Their bold lyrics and brash vocals, however, proved they were more than sweet little girls. They hopped about the stage, often calling for the crowd to constantly "jump!"

The audience willingly obliged. And DHC twisted and grooved, initiated sing-a-longs and even challenged the crowd to maintain their "bounce" throughout an entire song. Past the smiles and the charisma was a band who, as evident in the hushed pants and slightly glowing faces, gave it their all and did not hold back.

In return, the crowd gave its own contribution to the show. Besides the usual tiresome crowd-surfing, they often broke out in silly incomprehensible chants. At one point, the band invited loads of giggling girls on stage to take over and sing their own rendition of "He Wants Me Back." It was the perfect song for independent women who were feeling a little extra bitter on the night before the dreaded V-Day. Even though the scene invoked remembrances of that third-grade Christmas pageant or last week's Karaoke night at Shakey's, it won the crowd over with charming humor and fun.

Those favorite songs are what really got the crowd on its feet every time. The uncanny "So Sue Us" is characteristic of their hyper – "I don't give a shit" style. The house cheered and sang along with every word.

"Lost Again," a new hit, has recently seen a lot of air time on the radio and even was featured on a recent episode of "Beverly Hills, 90210." Songs such as "Mr. Blue" and "Queen For A Day" had great slammin' guitar moments and dished out danceable beats all over the place. This element is clearly something you cannot get from just listening to the album, due in part because Dance Hall Crashers are gifted live performers as well as talented musicians.

Although DHC gave an encore of "The Truth About Me" and two other old hits, the set ended entirely too soon. Many of the band's other favorites were saved for the next night's show to the disappointment of those unable to attend both performances. A few fans voiced their disapproval over the fact that not enough songs were played from their newest album, "Honey I'm Homely!" But DHC's vitality shined and left a packed Roxy screaming through the finale, happily satisfied, if not yearning for more.

How to Write an Effective Ad
- Start your ad with the merchandise you are selling. This makes it easier for readers to quickly scan the ads and locate your items.
- Always include the price of your item. Many classified readers simply do not respond to ads without prices.
- Avoid abbreviations—make you ad easy for readers to understand.
- Place yourself in the reader's position, ask what you would like to know about the merchandise, and include that in the ad. Include such information as brand names, colors and other specific descriptions.

The ASUCLA Communications Board fully supports the University of California's policy on nondiscrimination. no medium shall accept advertisements which present persons of any origin, race, sex, or sexual orientation in a demeaning way or imply that they are limited to positions, capabilities, roles, or status in society. PREVIOUS PUZZLE SOLVED

[Student Health Education. Here's mud in your eye.]

Oh what a night. Sure, you pretty much barely had your lip when pretty body sat down for a drink. Found at quarters. Of course you didn't want to be the old one. don't want to disappoint the gang now do you? Yeah, it was a great party. Great host. Actually before the fun, once you started seeing double. But here it is, the morning and you catch a real eyeful in the mirror. Good morning! Surprise! You can't hide those Social Eyes! Or is that bloodshot eyes? Along with Mr. Sun-shine accosting those big baby blues is a six-drummer in your head, a roller coaster in your stomach, and a woolly-headed pom-pom taste in your mouth.

So you got a little personal with that Aye Captain? Now if you could only remember where you left your tongue. Also, some folks never learn. And here's the real eye opener. Most UCLA students drink a lot less when they party. Some don't drink at all. Some are responsible. Some like disco. Some shirts that these Public Service Announcements are nothing more than eyesores. (If you're one of those who think that I've got two words for you and they aren't "Go Bruins") Anyway, if you're having a problem seeing things eye to eye, and your bed seems to be in the eye of a tornado, keep an eye out for mornings and remember when you've done it you're done. Aye, Aye, Capt'n.

why run all over the place when you have free access to apartment listings here on campus? looking for a place to live can be a real drag, and it's not like you've got all the time in the world. so who wants to drive around with their head out the window trying to read the type on those tiny "FOR RENT" signs? how are you supposed to know what an apartment will cost in Santa Monica or Brentwood or Palms? and is it close to the bus? wouldn't it be great if there was an office on campus that kept track of all that stuff for you? well maybe this is your lucky day because housing does more. you can look at apartment listings, or maybe you want to share a house with a couple friends. find a roommate-on-line even. you know you have free access to all this as a ucla student. you can even post listings for free or pick up some bus schedules. just give us a call at 825-4491. it wouldn't be a bad idea to get some info on how to get all of your security deposit back either since the only thing you need more than extra time, is extra money.....

mance since Scates expects Naeve to take some time to find his rhythm again.

Naeve isn't the only question mark for UCLA. Opposite Evan Thatcher experienced back spasms on Monday and was unable to practice. Outside hitter Ben Moselle has been practicing at the opposite position and could start the match. With Moselle at opposite, junior Fred Robins will likely step into the starting lineup alongside freshman Mark Williams.

"We're a very flexible team," Scates said. "In fact, the last time we played against Santa Barbara we used three different lineups, so it just depends on who's playing well."

While the Bruins will be busy making their own lineup adjustments, they will also need to focus on containing UCSB's top hitters.

Outside hitter Kevin Collins currently leads the Gauchos in kills with 122, while averaging 5.3 kills a game. Middle blocker Jeremy Darner is a player that Scates likens to UCLA's Naeve.

Although Darner is a quick hitter, he is on the receiving end of a majority of the sets. Like Naeve, the Gauchos will not hesitate to set him out of the back row. Darner averages 4.87 kills a game along with a .435 hitting clip.

> UCLA ... has swept eight of its ten opponents. The Bruins have only lost three games this year.

"He hurt us a lot last time we played them up there," Scates said. "We have to slow him down.

"You don't have to stop both of those guys, but if we take one of them out then you're in good shape because they don't go to the other players very much. If we can key on those two guys and effectively slow one of them, then we should be in good shape."

place. Mel Moultry finished third in the triple jump with a mark of 50-5 1/2.

Four members of the men's team went to Indianapolis, Ind., to race in the highly competitive Cannon IV Classic put on by Butler University.

Distance runner Mark Hauser made the most out of the trip to Indiana as he earned a personal record and an NCAA provisional qualifying mark in the 3,000. Hauser's time of 8:02.09 bettered his previous indoor best of 8:16.01, which he set last week at the Los Angeles Indoor Invitational.

Hauser finished ninth overall and was the sixth collegiate runner to cross the line. Coach Bob Larsen feels that Hauser will qualify for nationals since he is only one second away from the automatic qualifying time.

"It was a great race for (Hauser)," Larsen said. "It's a huge improvement for him. People run fast here every year."

Mebrahtom Keflezighi automatically qualified for nationals in the 5,000 after his performance on Saturday. Keflezighi finished fifth with a time of 13:59.17.

"The main goal was to qualify for nationals," Larsen said of Keflezighi's performance. "He's real strong but not real fast yet. The pace picked up and he couldn't go with the leaders."

Michael Granville and Jess Strutzel competed in the 800 on the short, 200-meter track. Granville finished third in 1:51.01 while Strutzel placed sixth in 1:52.64. The runners kept the pace modest throughout much of the race, after Granville, Strutzel and Larsen anticipated a fast race.

"Granville was too cautious and (Strutzel) should've caught up to (Granville) after he realized the pace was modest."

Meanwhile, the UCLA women's track and field team also made its mark at the Air Force Indoor Invitational.

Sophomore Deana Simmons took first in the women's triple jump event with a mark of 43-5. After an impressive showing in the long jump last weekend at the Los Angeles Indoor Invitational, Simmons competed in her primary event on Saturday and earned an automatic berth in the NCAA Indoor Track and Field Championships. Simmons will be the person to beat in the triple jump at the 1998 Pac-10 Championships.

In the women's pole vault, Erica Hoerning took second place with a mark of 11-5 3/4. This was Hoerning's first competition this season. She performed well against the rest of the field. She was tied for first place after her final vault, but received second on the tiebreaker.

In the women's long jump, Kelly O'Connor jumped a seasonal best 18-8 to take 11th place. Right behind her was fellow Bruin Keisha Porter, who jumped 18-3 to take 14th place. Both women added another foot on their jumps from last weekend's marks at the Los Angeles Indoor Invitational.

The women's shot put event was swept by UCLA for the second weekend in a row. Senior Nada Kawar, who has already qualified for the 1998 NCAA Indoor Championships, took second with a throw of 57-3/4 behind former Bruin Valeyta Althouse, who won with a throw of 61-8 3/4 while competing for Reebok. Kawar's top throw this weekend was a lifetime indoor best and the second-best throw in the nation for 1998.

Seilala Sua took third place in both the women's shot put, with a throw of 55-5, and the weight throw, with a mark of 58-1 1/4. Meanwhile, Rachelle Noble completed the women's sweep in the shot put with a fourth place throw of 50-11 1/2, and went on to capture the women's weight throw with a provisional mark of 61-9 1/2, which should qualify her for the indoor championships.

Last week, USC was routed at home by California, 73-43, and Stanford, 83-59, by a combined 54 points – the Trojans' largest total margin of defeat for consecutive home games in school history.

"It's been a disappointing year knowing that we are losing games," USC head coach Henry Bibby said. "We're just a little young – a little youthful – and we just don't know how to play at this level yet."

The top four players from last year's NCAA tournament squad all graduated – taking 60 percent of the team's points and almost all of its experience with them.

Like the Bruins, USC's roster has changed more often than Dennis Rodman's hair style.

Last week, guard Ken Sims was kicked off the team, while Bibby-suspended point guard Gary Johnson (curfew violation) and shooting guard Elias Ayuso (poor academic performance).

Both Johnson and Ayuso will return for tonight's contest.

All told, USC has started 16 different lineups this year.

her four attempts."

The depth of this team was demonstrated as even the benchers participated and expertly held off the Rainbows at the end of the game.

"We emptied the bench with about four minutes into the game, and I was really happy with that group," Baker said. "They did a good job. They made some good progress and played with some confidence."

Everyone agrees with the respectable performances by the defense and non-starters. But assistant coach Adam Krikorian admits he didn't know what to expect before the game.

"I was a little worried at first because it was our first home game, we never played this team and we've had some slow starts before," Krikorian said. "But the girls came out strong and even the people off the bench came in and hung in there to score a point or two against Hawaii.

"We'll take what we learned from this week, and that will help when we play them again in three weeks. We're still looking to improve. We're never ultimately satisfied."

The Bruins have the next weekend off from competition. The next two weeks is where they fine-tune their skills and strategies in preparation for a very busy midseason.

Baker hopes to take the momentum of the early season's success and improve during this period of two weeks.

"It was the nice way to finish the first part of the season," Baker said. "The next two weeks is very critical for the team. We've got to get a lot of work done and improve before we get busy with the upcoming games."

War of Independence

On May 14th 1948, the State of Israel was proclaimed according to the UN partition plan (1947). Over the radio David Ben-Gurion (who would be Israel's first Prime Minister) proclaimed the independence of the "Jewish State." The proclamation stated that the State of Israel "would be open to the immigration of Jews from all the countries of their dispersion." Non-Jewish citizens were promised freedom of religion and guaranteed that the sanctity of their religion and holy sites would be maintained.

Less than 24 hours later, the regular armies of Egypt, Jordan, Syria, Lebanon and Iraq invaded the country, forcing Israel to defend the sovereignty it had regained in its ancestral homeland. This began what is known as Israel's War of Independence (1948-1949). The war was fought in three stages and the final cease-fire was declared in January of 1949. During the first few months of 1949 direct negotiations were conducted under UN auspices between Israel and each of the invading countries (except Iraq which has refused to negotiate with Israel to date), resulting in armistice agreements which reflected the situation at the end of the fighting. Accordingly, the coastal plain, Galilee and the entire Negev were within Israel's sovereignty, Judea and Samaria (the West Bank) came under Jordanian rule, the Gaza Strip came under Egyptian administration, and the city of Jerusalem was divided with Jordan controlling the eastern part, including the Old City, and Israel the western sector. Under this agreement the Western Wall (Judaism's holiest site) came under Jordanian rule. According to this agreement Jordanians were to allow Jews access to the Western Wall. However, this was not honored and from 1948 until the Six Day War in 1967, when Israel captured the Old City, were Jews fully allowed access to their holy sites.

On the day that Israel was declared a state the National Anthem, called Hatikva (The Hope) was adopted. The poem expresses the Jewish people's desire to return to the Land of Israel.

So long as still within our breasts
The Jewish heart beats true,
So long as still toward the East
To Zion looks the Jew.

So long as our hopes are not yet lost,
Two thousand years we cherished them,
To live as a free people in our land,
Land of Zion and Jerusalem.

HOW THE PLANETS WORK
Saturday, February 21, 1998; 9am - 5pm, doors open at 8:15; No registration; Fowler Museum, Lenart Auditorium.
Presented by the UCLA Center for the Physics & Chemistry of the Planets, a research and education unit of the Institute for Geophysics and Planetary Physics.
This one day non-specialist talk is given by a group of world class research scientists who will present and discuss the most up to date knowledge and understanding we now have about planets and planetary systems. From the inner processes that result in surface earthquakes and mountain building process, to the outer processes that result in Ice Ages and meteorite impacts. Exciting results from the recent Mars Pathfinder Mission will also be presented.
This series is designed for the general public, public officials, high school and college students, teachers and UCLA Faculty, staff and students of all disciplines.
9:00 am: The Earth as a Dynamic System. Thomas H. Jordan MIT.
9:40 am: Mountain Building: Its Effects on Climatic Change. T. Mark Harrison, UCLA.
10:20 am: Earth's Ice Ages, Chaos Theory and What They Tell Us About Global Warming. Michael Ghil, UCLA.
11:00 am: Can We Predict Earthquakes? Leon Knopoff, UCLA.
1:30 pm: The Origin of Earth and Planets. George Wetherill, Carnegie Institute.
2:10 pm: The Core Dynamics of Plantary Magnetic Field. Gary Glatzmaier, Los Alamos National Lab.
2:50 pm: Meteor Impacts and their Role in Shaping Planetary Evolution. Thomas J. Ahrens, CalTech.
3:30 pm: The Mars Pathfinder: Last of the Cowboys. Anthony J. Spear, Jet Propulsion Labs.

Bruins shatter Rainbows with thundering 14 goals

W. WATERPOLO: Novice Hawaii team squashed by more experienced UCLA

By Steve Kim
Daily Bruin Contributor

The University of Hawaii water polo team's trans-Pacific visit to California was no trip to paradise, as it was greeted by its Bruin hosts with a shower of yellow balls. Fourteen yellow balls, to be precise.

Coming into the game, the Bruins did not know what to expect from this new team. On one hand, the Rainbows are inexperienced, playing together in their first varsity season. On the other hand, they came to the match with a 2-0 record and a handful of noteworthy foreign recruits.

But after the first quarter, there was no question as to who dominated.

The Bruins started explosively with fast offense, including three scores by junior Coralie Simmons and two scores by junior Catherine von Schwarz. Sophomore Erin Golaboski tied Simmons for most points scored with three, while sophomore Serela Mansur and freshman Kristin Guerin contributed two points each.

UCLA head coach Guy Baker was pleased with the team's first home game performance and looks forward to continued success.

"I liked the way we played in the first quarter," Baker said. "I was happy we got off to a good start and set the tone for the whole game. We talked about coming out and playing good defense and (getting) going on the fast break. And we did that."

Besides scoring 14 points against Hawaii, the Bruins' forte was in their superior defense. As good as senior goalie and team captain Nicolle Payne is, she didn't have much chance to block, thanks to her defensive teammates. The Rainbows could only score two points.

"We played really consistently and our defense was good," said Payne. "Everyone got to play and we had a lot of fun."

> "One of (Hawaii's) great players ended up scoring only one goal out of her four attempts."
> Mandy McAloon
> UCLA junior defender

Just about everyone raved about the defense, and one of the best defenders of the game was junior Mandy McAloon.

"We have a very strong defensive team as a whole – definitely not just one player," McAloon said. "To me, the defense wins the game and that's shown in our last tournament and this game. One of their great players ended up scoring only one goal out of

Ups and downs leave UCLA on high ground

BASEBALL: Bruins finally defeat Cal, prepare for Stanford after shaky start

By Vytas Mazeika
Daily Bruin Staff

After Jelani-gate, the Harrick fiasco and the women's softball probation, UCLA has taught everyone to expect the unexpected.

The UCLA baseball team likes the "unexpected" philosophy so much that they have decided to adopt it as well.

This past weekend at Berkeley, the No. 16 Bruins (6-4 overall, 2-0 in Six-Pac) were supposed to play three games against Cal (2-5-1, 0-2). But rain and darkness prevented UCLA from completing the series, and only two games were played.

On Friday, the first game of the series was suspended due to darkness in the seventh inning, with the Bruins up 11-8. Then on Saturday the game could not be finished due to rain. Finally on Sunday, the first game was completed with the Bruins coming out on top 13-8.

The same day, UCLA and Cal played the second game of the series. In arguably the most exciting game of the year so far, UCLA won 11-10 in 10 innings.

The final game of the series was to be played on Monday, but because of rain it was cancelled and rescheduled for March 31 – the day after UCLA visits Stanford.

To further support the "unexpected" theme, the Bruins won the second game against Cal thanks to a pinch-hitter.

Freshman outfielder Nick Lyon stepped up to the plate for only the second time this season and hammered a ball over the wall to provide UCLA with a 11-9 lead.

The Bruins' yo-yo season seemed doomed after a 1-4 start. But a current five-game winning streak and a 2-0 start in league play has the Bruins riding high.

The fact that UCLA came home for two weeks was not enough to drive the "unexpected" away.

With a game scheduled for Tuesday against Loyola Marymount, the Bruins returned to find that the baseball field at Jackie Robinson Stadium needed maintenance. The game is now scheduled to be played today at 3 p.m.

Sophomore pitcher Ryan Reightley, after missing his scheduled start against Cal, will start today for the Bruins and pitch only a few innings.

UCLA head coach Gary Adams wants his starters in top form when top-ranked Stanford plays three games at UCLA this weekend.

Bruins to face USC without McCoy

M. BASKETBALL: With shuffled lineup, team hastens to toughen defense as Duke game nears

By Brent Boyd
Daily Bruin Staff

They've done it before, and now they'll have to do it again.

The Bruins will enter their second stint tonight without Jelani McCoy and his 6-foot-10-inch frame standing in the middle of the key.

In its first game since the resignation of McCoy, UCLA (19-5, 9-4 Pac-10) will take on USC at the Sports Arena in a game that will undoubtedly be used as a measuring stick for how well the Bruins will perform without their star center.

It will be the only tune-up for the McCoy-less Bruins before Sunday's showdown at second-ranked Duke. And with only three weeks to prepare for the NCAA tournament, the game takes on added significance.

"Obviously this is a big week," head coach Steve Lavin said. "We've got to find a way to improve, and we only have three weeks to do it. We need to play better defense, collectively."

McCoy also missed the first nine games of the season due to suspension for undisclosed reasons.

In his absence, the Bruins amassed an 8-1 record, which included their only victory over a ranked team this season – a 69-58 win over then-No. 8 New Mexico.

Without McCoy, the Bruins will have a giant hole to fill. J.R. Henderson (6 feet 8 1/2 inches) will move over to full-time center, while freshman Travis Reed (6 feet 6 inches) figures to pick up more minutes at forward.

"With (McCoy) resigning, we're obviously much smaller," Lavin said. "We'll have to generate more points from the bench. Reed will definitely get more playing time."

Throughout the year, Lavin has mainly used a six-player rotation, resulting in inexperience among the reserves.

Reed, however, played well in the nine games before McCoy's return, averaging 5.4 points and 3.2 rebounds while playing about 15 minutes per game. Included in that stretch was a 14-point, 10-rebound performance against Cal State Fullerton and another 14-point outing against New Mexico.

Since McCoy's return, though, Reed has seen limited action. He has only played in nine of the past 15 games for a total of 63 minutes.

"I'm going to have to be a big presence, just like I was before," Reed said. "Except this time, he's not coming back."

The matchup against the Trojans (7-16, 3-10) couldn't have come at a better time for the Bruins, who have lost two of their last four games and barely pulled out a three-point victory over California Saturday.

In addition to USC's lack of a player taller than 6 feet 8 inches, Troy has been struggling of

Team gets set to compete in nationals

TRACK: Weekend results bring hopes for strong Bruin presence at NCAAs

By Alvin Cadman and Donald Morrison
Daily Bruin Contributors

UCLA track and field assistant coach Art Venegas said the team could be on its way to putting together a strong showing at the NCAA Indoor National Championships in March if enough members qualify. After Saturday's performances at two different meets, Venegas feels quite optimistic about the team's chances of finishing high at the national championships.

"We want to put together a good NCAA team," Venegas said. "If we can get certain people into nationals, then we'll have a heck of a shot."

Two athletes that have a heck of a shot at qualifying for the NCAA indoor championships are Jim McElroy and Damian Allen. McElroy and Allen turned in stellar performances in the 55-meter dash at the Air Force Indoor Invitational in Colorado Springs, Colo.

McElroy and Allen, who are used to running short distances as members of the football team, each finished in the time of 6 minutes, 17 seconds. McElroy finished third and Allen placed fifth in their respective races. Their time is one-hundredth of a second off the automatic qualifying time for the NCAA Championships. Venegas feels that their time, which is a provisional qualifying time, will be good enough to get them into the championships.

"That's an excellent indoor time," Venegas said. "The football players are showing their explosiveness. They're showing their speed and what kind of shape they're in early on in the season."

Travis Haynes, who also competed at Air Force, automatically qualified for the NCAA Championships with a mark of 61-7 3/4 in the shot put. Haynes also set an indoor lifetime best while finishing third. Wade Tift finished fourth in the same event with a mark of 60-1.

Four other athletes competed at the Air Force meet and performed well. Luke Sullivan's mark of 61-11 in the weight throw was good enough to earn him a victory. Rich Pitchford captured second place in the high-jump with a leap of 7 1/4. Scott Slover vaulted 17-10 1/2 in the pole vault, which was good enough for second

Undefeated UCLA looks to trample mediocre Gauchos

M. VOLLEYBALL: Despite injuries, No. 1 Bruins to offer little hope to UCSB

By Grace Wen
Daily Bruin Staff

The undefeated UCLA men's volleyball team continues its stint at home tonight against UC Santa Barbara. The top-ranked Bruins will take on the No. 10 Gauchos in Pauley Pavilion at 7 p.m.

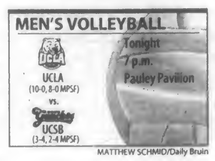
UCLA (10-0 overall, 8-0 Mountain Pacific Sports Federation) will look to capitalize on a mediocre Gaucho season. UCSB will be playing its first match on the road; it could be a tough time for the visiting Gauchos.

Although UCSB (3-4, 2-4) is coming off a win against Pacific, the Gauchos have not fared well thus far into the season.

UCSB was swept by Stanford, UC Irvine and the Bruins in matches earlier this season.

"Santa Barbara's been playing well, but they've been losing," UCLA head coach Al Scates said. "The coaches respect them and keep voting them up in the top 10 even though they don't have a good record.

"I think they're a play-off team, but they better start moving soon. I just don't want them to start (tonight)."



MATTHEW SCHMID/Daily Bruin

UCLA, on the other hand, has swept eight of its 10 opponents. The Bruins have only lost three games this year.

Returning to the lineup for the Bruins will be sophomore Adam Naeve, who hasn't played in the Bruins' last three matches and didn't practice for 10 days.

Naeve suffered second-degree burns two weeks ago. He played sparingly in UCLA's win against Long Beach State and did not suit up for the matches against the San Diego schools.

In the Bruins' previous meeting with the Gauchos, Naeve recorded a match-high 30 kills. It is unlikely that Naeve will have a repeat perfor-

Neighbors groan over porn store

WESTWOOD: Adult-video office investigated; vice squad issues citation for lack of a permit

By Rachel Muñoz
Daily Bruin Staff

Pornography or adult entertainment? Legal or illegal? These are the questions surrounding the Hot Body International business that has quietly resided in Westwood for over a year.

On Jan. 29, tipped off by homeowners groups complaining of a pornography video store, the West Los Angeles Vice Squad investigated an office space at 10872 Weyburn Ave.

"We went there and (the video store) was not what we found," said Sargent Doug Abney, who heads the unit that was called to the location. "You can't tell what type of business it is from the outside."

What the officers did find inside the building belonging to developer Ira Smedra was two or three workers boxing up adult entertainment videos.

When the officers saw that the business appeared to be only a distribution center, they went ahead and "checked for all of the permits."

Not having a business license was the only offense that Hot Body International was guilty of. It is considered a "minor offense." A citation, equivalent to a traffic ticket, was written and the company will have to appear in court.

"The business-license angle is the only thing that they found that they could give us grief over," said John Cross, the president of Hot Body International.

However, Cross knew that he wouldn't be renting the office on Weyburn forever. He felt their time might be limited because the Village Center Westwood project may be built on that same property. "We looked at it as a temporary warehouse space."

But that isn't the only Westwood area location that Hot Body International uses for business space. There is also a home office on Levering, where Cross lives.

Mantle magma answers some quake questions

RESEARCH: Molten rock pools may help scientists ascertain causes of seismic disturbances

By Matt Grace
Daily Bruin Contributor

On the other side of the globe, earthquakes greater than 6.0 on the Richter scale pound the tiny island of Tonga in the Southwest Pacific.

At the same time they provide scientists on South Campus with unique insights into the solid-liquid interfaces governing the unpredictable activity of earthquakes.

Using equipment originally designed to spy on the nuclear activities of Russia, John Vidale of UCLA and Michael Hedlin of UC San Diego have provided the strongest evidence to date for the existence of molten magma reservoirs, suspended thousands of miles beneath the earth's surface.

"This is an incremental and important step in the characterization of the core-mantle boundary," said Jim Whitcomb, the program director for geophysics at the National Science Foundation.

The military-subsidized network of 130 seismometers dotted over 60 square miles in southern Norway, detect faint seismic vibrations, created by anything from earthquakes to atomic bombs.

The discovery of molten lakes of rock – roughly the size of California – provide strong evidence against the earth's mantle consisting entirely of solid rock.

The scientists based their analysis on seismic waves which passed through the mantle from 25 earthquakes hitting Tonga in the last two decades.

They found obstacles within the mantle which changed the direction of the seismic waves. If the mantle was composed completely of solid rock, then the seismic waves would travel in a straight line.

The existence of a liquid-solid interface offers the only explanation for the discrepancies in seismic wave activity.

"The melt scatters (the seismic waves) off in all directions," said John Vidale, associate professor

Beware of parking in tow-away zones

PARKING: Temporary signs had been ignored; contractors ask for 50 cars to be moved

By Barbara Ortutay
Daily Bruin Contributor

Students who parked their cars in the seemingly unenforced tow-away zone on Gayley (between Veteran and Strathmore) may have woken up to an unpleasant surprise on Friday and Monday morning.

Around 10 a.m. Friday and 11 a.m. Monday, Los Angeles city parking enforcement towed every car parked along the north side of Gayley – 50 total.

The signs say cars will be towed if they are parked in the zone from 6 a.m. to 6 p.m.

Although some students who happened to be around managed to move their cars before they were towed, many others were in class and not aware of the situation.

"My friend is taking two midterms right now, he didn't know about this," said David Smith, a third-year student. After he explained his friend's situation to the parking enforcement officers, they did not tow the car.

The temporary tow-away zone signs have been up for over a week, but students have been parking there anyway because the no-parking zone has not been enforced.

There were other no-parking signs up in connection with the De Neve Plaza project that have not been enforced consistently, either.

"It's kind of unfair that they pick a random day to enforce a rule that they don't follow on other days," said second-year student Paul Milinsky, after successfully moving his car to the other side of the street.

According to Ed Lloyd from Neilsen-Dellingham, the company in charge of the De Neve Plaza Project, the call to tow the cars came from Doty Brothers Development, the company employed by the L.A. department of transportation.

Doty Brothers Development is employed by the city to construct a new sidewalk on Gayley and Strathmore. They have no connection to UCLA.

According to Jeff Kaelar, a representative from the company that towed the cars, the zone was not enforced earlier because the construction did not reach the area until Friday, so there was no need for the cars to be moved.

"The contractor calls the city and the city calls us," Kaelar said.

According to city employee Wilbur Takashima, unless parking enforcement regularly patrols the area, the contractor renting the site must call to have a no-parking zone enforced.

"Typically, a tow will not take place unless the contractor called to complain," he said.

In addition to being charged with a $30 ticket, students who had their cars towed will be charged for the cost of the towing, which typically costs $100 to $200.

The towing drew a small group of disgruntled onlookers who were not parked on the street, but who did express their dissatisfaction with parking enforcement.

"This sucks," said graduate student Angel Covarrubias.

By Tuesday, construction on the side of the street began, so cars were physically unable to park in the no-parking zone.

Scientists develop way to regrow hip-bone

A UCLA orthopedic surgeon has developed a new technique to treat bone death in human hips that may prevent the need for a total hip replacement.

"In the 12 cases we've done since 1991, the procedure has obtained good to excellent pain relief for our patients," said Dr. Jay Lieberman, assistant professor of orthopedic surgery and originator of the technique. "People who had difficulty walking across the room are now hiking, golfing and returning to fully active lives."

Surgeons see about 20,000 cases of osteonecrosis, or "bone death," a year. It occurs when the blood supply feeding the head of the femur bone dies. The femoral head, the knobby end of the thighbone, fits into the hip socket.

"Early intervention is important," Lieberman said. "If a significant amount of bone dies, the femoral head eventually collapses under the weight of the hip joint."

Lieberman's technique, called osteoregeneration, is a modification of an already existing technique called core decompression. In core decompression, the surgeon drills a hole into the femoral head and removes the dead bone inside to relieve pressure, restore blood flow and encourage new bone growth.

In osteoregeneration, the surgeon also implants a capsule filled with a substance known as BMP, or bone-morphogenetic protein, which induces the body to grow new bone in replacement of the decayed bone.

After implanting the capsule of BMP, Lieberman implants an amount of purified human bone impregnated with BMP into the femoral head.

Use of Internet up among business

The Internet is becoming more popular with businesses.

In Orange County alone, 92 percent of the companies are connected to the Internet. International companies, mostly high-tech firms, lead the country with 97 percent use.

The portion of Orange County businesses with a home page or site on the World Wide Web has leaped to 79 percent from 59 percent last year, more than doubling what it was two years ago, according to the UC Irvine Graduate School of Management's 1998 Orange County Executive Survey. Among international businesses, 86 percent have a web site, compared to 69 percent last year.

With technology on the rise, using the Internet for e-mail alone has become a thing of the past. Although e-mail is still the chief form of Internet business support, many also use it to communicate with employees, customers and suppliers.

Firms are increasingly providing access to their employees. This year, about 36 percent of employees have access to the Internet, compared to only 30 percent last year.

Many executives cite efficiency and reduced cost of doing business as the main advantages of using the Internet.

Federal committee says Berkeley discriminated

The federal government has concluded that there is evidence UC Berkeley illegally discriminated against a white male employee and retaliated against him when he filed a complaint.

The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission also found that the university's Department of Housing and Dining Services spun a web of lies to explain why it passed the employee up for promotion and punished him for filing his complaint.

The EEOC "letters of determination" stem from a November 1995 complaint filed by Ken Crawford, a white male who is an on-call manager with the dining department. He was rejected for the position of dining services manager at the in 1994. Crawford, the dining services manager for the hall for the 1993-94 school year, said a lesser-qualified black male with no management experience was hired instead.

BREWIN' UP A STORM

Coffehouse manager Dave Newlove makes sure students get their espresso

By Michelle Navarro
Daily Bruin Staff

If there is anyone who would benefit from cloning, it's Dave Newlove. Keeping Kerckhoff Coffeehouse, the Kerckhoff Patio Cart and Viewpoint Cafe all running smoothly requires the coffeehouse manager to be everywhere all at once.

Caught in the blender of Kerckhoff Hall, Newlove is constantly running up, down and all around, giving orders to all the employees, occasionally helping out during rushes and making sure the espresso has just the right taste.

"So many drinks are based on espresso, so it's important that it's right," he said, adding milk to a small plastic cup full of espresso. "Milk takes away the bitterness, but if it's brewed wrong, you still get the bitter taste. The humidity and temperature affect how it comes out, it's the most temperamental thing."

It's the details like those that Newlove must always remember.

"I've done it for so long," Newlove said, "it's almost like second nature to me."

And it's a good thing remembering comes easy, because when the line began to form upstairs in Kerckhoff at 7 a.m., on a typical day for Newlove, he had to be ready. He'd already woken up two hours before to make it there on time and get everything set up.

So even before the saggy-eyed ASUCLA employees and students queued up for their much-needed dose of caffeine and even before the sun rose, Newlove started his day.

"I go to work in the dark and go home in the dark," he said, mentioning he usually doesn't return home until 7 p.m.

Renovated Treehouse will welcome Rubio's, La Cucina

ASUCLA: Goal of current privatization is to best serve UCLA community

By Michael Weiner
Daily Bruin Contributor

ASUCLA has negotiated contracts with Rubio's Baja Grill and La Cucina to renovate Treehouse and open restaurants there next fall.

Rubio's Baja Grill, a Mexican restaurant, specializes in fish tacos, but also offers a variety of other Mexican foods. La Cucina is a fresh pasta restaurant operated by the Italian-food chain Sbarro.

Rubio's and La Cucina will replace The Market Place, Mainstreet, C&C Company and Pasta Resistance – the restaurants which currently reside in Treehouse. They will close at the end of the year.

ASUCLA board member Jim Friedman said that Rubio's will become a cohesive part of the campus community.

"One of the most appealing things was their desire to work with us on the campus," said Friedman, the association's food services strategy committee chair.

Currently, Treehouse sandwich lines are only open during lunch. Employees will still have jobs in food services when Rubio's and La Cucina move in. The two restaurants also plan to hire students.

"They are committed to hiring students and doing things that reflect the market they're in," Friedman said.

Friedman said that Sbarro will design La Cucina's menu in accordance with students' needs and wants, although both new menus will be more expensive.

"They were willing to define a menu based on what they do and what we want," Friedman said.

The two restaurants will pay for the renovation of Treehouse over the summer and be ready for opening in the fall.

"The Treehouse was built in 1961, and it definitely showed its age," said Terence Hsiao, ASUCLA business development director. "We weren't in a financial position to renovate it."

"(The contracts with the restaurants) allow us to do more things because it frees us of the obligation to renovate Treehouse," he continued.

ASUCLA Executive Director Patricia Eastman said that the strongest impetus for bringing in the new restaurants was the need to renovate Treehouse.

"That's the real reason we sought outsiders," Eastman said.

Last spring, ASUCLA surveyed the campus, asking students what changes they would like to see in food services.

"We tried to think of what people wanted based on the food service survey," Friedman said. "What they wanted was fresh, healthy food."

In addition, students desired Mexican food, pasta and rotisserie chicken. Friedman said that ASUCLA is currently looking into opening a chicken restaurant in the Cooperage, possibly in the space currently occupied by De Nuevo, since there will not be a need for two Mexican restaurants in the same building.

Hsiao said that the privatization of Treehouse will not start a trend for ASUCLA food services. He believes it is important to maintain a mix of students' association restaurants and private restaurants.

"The basic strategy we're pursuing is that the campus is best served by having ASUCLA's own restaurants and a few selected outside operators," Hsiao said.

Hsiao also said that the contracts with Rubio's and La Cucina are similar to the current contract with Panda Express, which was brought in when ASUCLA felt it could not fulfill students' needs.

"We had developed an Asian food line that was not well received, so we brought in Panda Express," Hsiao said.

But Hsiao emphasized that privatizing all of food services would not be in the best interests of the ASUCLA because it would lose the flexibility to change.

"Once you get yourself into an agreement with someone, you lock yourself in for a fairly extended period of time," Hsiao said.

He also said that complete privatization would not contribute to the atmosphere that ASUCLA wants to maintain.

"If everything is a McDonald's, or Carl's Jr., or a Kentucky Fried Chicken, there's a real loss there in terms of UCLA's sense of place," Hsiao said.

Bomber crashes on training mission

ACCIDENT: One airman, no civilians injured by downing of B-1B Lancer

By Ted Bridis
The Associated Press

MARION, Kentucky – Four crew members of an Air Force bomber on a training mission parachuted to safety moments before the plane crashed and exploded Wednesday in a muddy cow field in western Kentucky.

The plane flew about 10 miles after the crew members ejected.

Two walked to a phone and called for help, while another was found walking on a road. The fourth's parachute caught in a tree and he suffered head and neck injuries. All four were taken to the hospital; their conditions were not immediately known.

The B-1B bomber was flying out of Dyess Air Force Base near Abilene, Texas, when it went down near Mattoon, a rural area five miles northeast of Marion near the Ohio River, said First Lt. Eric Elliott of Langley Air Force Base in Virginia.

The bomber was not being dispatched to the Persian Gulf and was not carrying munitions, Air Force officials said.

Military police from Fort Campbell, Ky., were securing the scene. There was no immediate word as to a cause. State police said the plane went down around 1:15 p.m.

Mark Williams, who lives about a quarter mile away, said he was picking up his mail when he heard an explosion, looked up and saw a mushroom-shaped cloud. The blast shook his pickup truck.

Williams drove to the crash site and said the biggest piece of wreckage could fit in the bed of his pickup, while the rest was reduced to pieces slightly larger than a dinner plate.

Jamie Riley saw the plane pass over the town of Mexico, about 14 miles from the crash site, and told the weekly Crittenden Press that the bomber was about 200 feet above the treetops.

"I don't see how it was high enough for anybody to bail out," Riley said.

Beverly Herrin told the newspaper the engines quit near Marion.

"I heard it roaring and looked toward Marion," he said. "By the time it came into sight, everything was quiet. It was gliding at about a 20-degree angle."

Designed in the 1970s as a nuclear bomb-dropper, the plane has been converted since then for conventional missions and is being deployed to the Mideast for the first time in a potential combat role.

Last September, a pilot's attempt to perform an uncommon but permissible maneuver led to a crash of a B-1B bomber that killed all four people aboard.

The Air Force reported in December that the pilot of the $200 million plane was making a sharp right turn during a Sept. 19 training mission on the Montana prairie when the plane neared stall speed and crashed. The technique is uncommon, but not forbidden.

That crash was the sixth military air disaster in a seven-day period, and it prompted an unprecedented 24-hour grounding of military planes for safety training.

However, at 1.37 crashes per 100,000 flying hours in the fiscal year ending Sept. 30, the Air Force reported it had its fourth safest year ever.

After 56 years, memories of Japanese camps live on

INTERNMENT: Younger generations hope pains will never happen again

By Imbert Matthee
Seattle Post-Intelligencer

Fifty-six years ago today, President Franklin D. Roosevelt signed Executive Order 9066 leading to the relocation and internment of 120,000 people of Japanese ancestry on the West Coast. Seven out of 10 were U.S. citizens.

Thousands of Japanese American families in Washington State were among the victims of what a 1983 presidential commission called racism, wartime hysteria and a lack of political leadership in the wake of the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor.

They came from Bainbridge Island, Bellevue, Renton, Tukwila, Kent, Auburn, Sumner, Tacoma and downtown Seattle. In community after community, they were first evacuated to the Puyallup Fairgrounds and later transported to one of 10 relocation camps in seven states.

Aside from their freedom and constitutional rights, they lost careers, homes, farms, stores, personal property and the feeling of belonging to a nation.

In August 1988, after a decade-long campaign led by the Japanese-American Citizens League, Congress passed a bill offering a formal apology and payments of $20,000 to every surviving internee.

But most continue to remember their wartime incarceration and believe that speaking out about this dark chapter in their country's past may help prevent it from happening in the future.

Here are a handful of their stories:

The 77-year-old widow from Beacon Hill was 21 at the time her family was evacuated. She was a student at the University of Washington. Her father had a clothing store in the International District on a site that is now a post office, kitty-cornered from the Uwajimaya grocery store.

"We were living a normal life," she said. "All of a sudden, some of my friends' fathers disappeared (arrested as suspected or potential spies) and we

Deng Xiaoping leaves legacy of unfinished reform

CHINA: One year after leader's death, country ponders new direction

By Charles Hutzler
The Associated Press

BEIJING – Spotting the green-uniformed police, two dozen scruffy-looking men fled their daily chore of seeking work.

"Finding a job is really hard," one breathless fugitive, a farmer named Cui, said before hurdling over the side of an overpass and scurrying down a bank to seek cover under the bridge.

Job-seeking migrants such as Cui are among the most common by-products of China's reforms. Crowding into already clogged cities by the tens of millions, they form the darker side of a legacy that has raised skyscrapers and incomes across what was one of the world's poorest countries.

In the year since the Feb. 19, 1997, death of reformist patriarch Deng Xiaoping, the unintended effects of his two-decade effort have worsened. Corruption remains rampant, gaps between the newly rich and bedrock poor are widening, unemployment is soaring and social ills such as prostitution and drug abuse are spreading.

"Deng Xiaoping was the architect, but he solved only the problems of the first period of reform. He left behind a lot of other ones for his successors to solve," said Wang Shan, an author and political commentator.

The Associated Press

Chinese leader Deng Xiaoping died while implementing reforms.

A man of Deng's revolutionary credentials and achievements commands influence even in death, and his political heirs in the ruling Communist Party are not letting Thursday's anniversary of his passing go quietly.

In ways solemn and kitsch, China is celebrating the man and the statesman. Stamps, video compact discs and books bearing his likeness and words are being produced. Symposiums on his policies are being held. Even an exhibition of portraits done in needlepoint embroidery has been staged.

"We stand on the great man's shoulders. The great man's shoulders carry the hopes of one people," intoned the party's flagship newspaper, People's Daily, in a front-page homage Wednesday.

> Jiang Zemin and his colleagues are taking risks Deng Xioaping contemplated but never dared.

The thrust behind the memorials – syrupy, sentimental ones included – is the same concept. Deng's heirs are seeking legitimacy in his mantle and pushing ahead with more pragmatic economic reforms.

People's Daily listed the new leadership's successes in the post-Deng year: the smooth recovery of Hong Kong, President Jiang Zemin's red-carpet welcome at the White House and a landmark party congress that launched an ambitious program to revitalize state industries.

By bringing capitalist reforms to state enterprises, relics of the era of central planning that employ two-thirds of the urban

U.N. chief hopes for successful Baghdad visit with Hussein

IRAQ: U.S. officials warn council that not just any settlement is acceptable

By Robert H. Reid
The Associated Press

UNITED NATIONS – The U.N. chief said Wednesday he will meet Saddam Hussein in Baghdad with the full support of the 15-member Security Council and that he was leaving with a "reasonable chance of success."

"I'm happy that on this issue, at this critical stage, the unanimity of the council has been re-established, and that they are behind what I'm going to Baghdad to do," Secretary-General Kofi Annan told reporters after he briefed the council on the trip.

Annan said he was also encouraged by signals he was receiving from Baghdad "that they are prepared to engage constructively to find a solution."

He cautioned that "it is a difficult mission coming at a very critical juncture."

Annan noted that he had said in the past that "I needed to have a reasonable chance of success before I left, and that is why I'm leaving."

Despite the council's support, British and U.S. officials have cautioned that they won't accept any settlement that would dilute the power of the U.N. Special Commission on Iraq, which is charged with carrying out the weapons inspections.

The secretary-general announced his decision to go to Baghdad on Tuesday, hours after President Clinton laid the groundwork for a possible air strike to force Iraqi compliance.

"He has our full support and Godspeed, but it's up to Iraq to comply," U.S. Ambassador Bill Richardson said Wednesday. "If Iraq does not comply, there are going to be some very, very serious consequences."

Hsia indicted for hiding illegal campaign contributions

FUND-RAISING: Buddhist temple disguised funds for Democrats, jury says

By Michael J. Sniffen
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON – A federal grand jury charged Democratic fund-raiser Maria Hsia on Wednesday with disguising illegal campaign contributions by a California Buddhist temple to the Clinton-Gore re-election campaign and other politicians between 1993 and 1996.

The second indictment brought by the Justice Department's campaign finance task force was hailed by Attorney General Janet Reno as "yet another step forward" in her investigation of finance abuses during the 1996 election. Reno has been under Republican fire for refusing to hand the case to an independent counsel.

The Hsi Lai Temple, located in the Los Angeles suburb of Hacienda Heights, Calif., was named as an unindicted co-conspirator. Formally incorporated as the International Buddhist Progress Society, the temple is a tax-exempt religious organization barred from participating in any political campaign. Political contributions from corporations also are illegal.

The long-anticipated Hsia indictment has been cited by political observers as a potential problem for Vice President Al Gore and his ambition to seek the presidency in 2000. Gore was not charged in the case, but the indictment mentioned three fund-raisers that he attended and two that Clinton attended for which the grand jury charged Hsia raised disguised contributions.

Three temple nuns told a Senate committee last fall the temple illegally reimbursed donors after an April 1996 fund-raiser that Gore attended

Vatican opposed to frozen embryos

VATICAN CITY – The Vatican newspaper said Wednesday there were some "positive aspects" to the birth of a child from an embryo frozen for 7 1/2 years, but condemned the fertility techniques used in his conception.

An 8-pound, 15-ounce infant born in California on Monday came from an embryo frozen in 1989 after his parents underwent fertility treatments.

They had a son in 1990 after the treatments, then forgot about the frozen embryo until last year. They decided to have a second child rather than destroy the embryo.

L'Osservatore Romano, the Vatican newspaper, praised the decision of the couple to have a second child and also approved that the child was born to his natural parents into an apparently loving home.

It said these positive aspects do not exempt the case from the church's negative judgment on such fertility procedures.

Pope John Paul II has denounced in vitro fertilization and hormonal treatments on post-menopausal women and has called for an end to the production of frozen embryos, equating their destruction to abortion.

No criminal charges to be filed in ferry disaster

STOCKHOLM, Sweden – The investigation into the Estonia ferry disaster that killed 852 people is being closed without any criminal indictments filed, a prosecutor said today.

"I'm not saying that nobody did anything wrong, only that I did not find anyone who was criminally careless," prosecutor Tomas Lindstrand said, according to the Swedish news agency, TT.

The Estonia sank on Sept. 28, 1994, on a trip to Stockholm from the Estonian capital of Tallinn. The ferry's visor-style bow door was torn off by heavy seas and water poured into the ship's vehicle deck.

A Swedish-Finnish-Estonian commission investigating the causes of the disaster cited poor lock design and slow response by the ferry's crew.

Another investigation, commissioned by the boat's builder, the Meyer Werft company of Hamburg, Germany, blamed poor maintenance of the ship.

Lawsuits brought by survivors and victims' relatives are pending against Meyer Werft, the French Bureau Veritas classification agency that certified the ship, and Sweden's national maritime administration.

Bookseller charged with child pornography

MONTGOMERY, Ala. – An Alabama grand jury indicted the nation's largest bookseller, Barnes & Noble, on child pornography charges involving the sale of books by noted photographers whose work includes pictures of nude children.

State Attorney General Bill Pryor said Wednesday he started the grand jury investigation after receiving complaints about two books being sold at Barnes & Noble stores in Alabama: "The Age of Innocence" by French photographer David Hamilton and "Radiant Identities" by San Francisco photographer Jock Sturges.

The indictment accuses the New York-based company of disseminating "obscene material containing visual reproduction of persons under 17 years of age involved in obscene acts."

The indictment was returned by the grand jury Feb. 6 but not made public until Wednesday. It involves 15 counts over the sale of "The Age of Innocence" and 17 counts over the sale of "Radiant Identities." If Barnes & Noble is convicted, the company could be fined up to $10,000 on each of the 32 counts.

El Niño's unfailing wrath keeps busy bees away

AGRICULTURE: Farmers worry, try to prepare for increasing crop damage

By Joe Bigham

FRESNO, Calif. – If El Niño storms keep pounding California, farmers won't be able to plant vegetables on time, and bees won't pollinate fruit and nut blossoms properly.

So far, a series of February storms has caused only minor damage to the state's $24.5 billion agribusiness industry. But growers worry about a National Weather Service prediction that rain will keep falling off and on all spring in a state where the sun usually shines pretty steadily after March.

"If this keeps up and keeps growers from planting vegetable crops or corn for dairies, it could have a ripple effect through the entire agriculture economy," Central California nurseryman Bob Driver said Wednesday.

The most immediate concern is for almonds, a $1 billion crop in which trees are blooming right now for bees to pollinate. However, when it rains, bees huddle in their hives instead of buzzing around the trees.

Skies were clear Wednesday, but there was a threat of rain for Thursday with more storms piled up in the Pacific to discourage bees and knock blooms off trees.

"We need two more weeks like this to pollinate all varieties," Driver said of the good weather.

Lettuce growers in Salinas Valley, dubbed the nation's Salad Bowl, also need relief from coastal squalls. Continued El Niño rains would disrupt normal planting schedules, says Michael Boggiatto, who harvests and markets for lettuce growers.

"As rains continue, and ground continues to be too wet to work up and plant, there's a possibility that there may be some gaps in production," Boggiatto said.

Some farmers in Arizona and New Mexico who usually plant other crops have switched to lettuce, anticipating shortages in California's $735 million crop, he added.

"There could be overproduction at some time slots because of these people coming in with product who wouldn't normally have it," Boggiatto said.

Southern California strawberries have been hit hardest by the rains to date, sustaining $10.7 million damage, according to state Department of Food and Agriculture statistics. But growers expect rain this time of year and lay out their fields so they'll drain well, said Theresa Thorne of the California Strawberry Commission.

"Every year, they get rain, and they plan for it," Thorne said. "It's part of the equation, so if anybody can survive El Niño, I think it will be strawberry farmers."

The statewide loss for all crops has reached $65.6 million, far below the $748.6 million damage from a pair of brutal storms in 1995 and $245 million from extensive flooding around New Year's Day last year.

But farmers still fret about the future after learning that California is likely to endure El Niño storms for weeks, perhaps months.

"The last third of El Niño is the wettest," agriculture weather forecaster John Hibler told a group of farmers.

Ads lure unsuspecting immigrants

CHEATING: Suspicious companies being sued for deceptive advertising

By Julie Chao
San Francisco Examiner

SAN FRANCISCO – Untold numbers of unscrupulous immigration consultants are preying on poor, powerless immigrants in California, several lawyers say.

"It's a huge problem," said Kathleen Michon, an attorney at the Public Counsel Law Center in Los Angeles. "You can walk down any street in a poor neighborhood or neighborhood of immigrants and see signs posted" for immigration services.

> A complaint filed ... accuses Master International Service of deceptive advertising.

The immigrants make easy targets because they either speak little English and are unsure how to complain to authorities or are illegal themselves and afraid to contact police. Authorities say the problem has proliferated in the past few years with record numbers of immigrants applying for naturalization, many in a panic over welfare and immigration reform.

No immigrant community is immune. Prosecution can be problematic.

"They're hard to find," said Sara Campos, an attorney with the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights in San Francisco who heads a task force working with local prosecutors to identify and investigate suspicious companies. "They're fly-by-night operations. They're here today, gone tomorrow."

A small San Francisco law firm specializing in immigration has sued two companies it suspects of cheating customers.

A complaint filed Friday in San Francisco Superior Court accuses Master International Service of deceptive advertising and unfair business practices.

Master's ads boast that it can get political asylum and then a green card in six months. Attorney Steve Baughman of the law firm Baughman & Wang said a one-year wait is the federally mandated minimum to get a green card after first obtaining political asylum.

"They're luring these people in with these sexy offers which none of us can match, then don't come through," Baughman said.

A Superior Court judge granted a temporary restraining order that restricts Master from continuing immigration services and withdrawing funds from its bank accounts.

Baughman said he decided to sue, with himself as the plaintiff, because a former Master customer who said he was cheated was too intimidated to sue.

Yinan Zhang, a Beijing native who opened Master last April, said in an interview Tuesday that his ads were completely honest. He explained that the recommendation for approval of a green card – not the actual green card – is what he can get in six months.

"I think they're suing because they're jealous," Zhang said. "Some cases they can't handle so the customer comes to us."

Justin Wang, Baughman's law partner, said his firm stood to gain nothing financially by suing, but "we feel we need to send a warning to these people."

Zhang vowed to fight the suit. Baughman & Wang filed suits alleging fraud and negligence against a second company, AN Enterprise, last fall on behalf of two former AN clients. After unsuccessfully challenging the suit for several months, AN Enterprise suddenly closed last month and its owners disappeared.

AN's ads in the Chinese-language World Journal described the company as a "Sino-American Legal Center" that could provide "express green cards."

"They submit phony documents and make promises that are simply impossible to fulfill," Baughman said.

Violations of Pentagon homosexual policies rampant

MILITARY: Harassment of gays in service reaches record levels, report says

By Eric Rosenberg
Hearst News

WASHINGTON — The armed forces last year violated in record numbers a Pentagon policy designed to make it easier for homosexuals to serve in the military, according to the Service members Legal Defense Network (SLDN), a gay rights legal organization here.

It cited 563 violations, a 27 percent jump over the previous year's number and an increase for the fourth year in a row.

The legal defense group's findings are contained in a report, "Conduct Unbecoming," due to be released Thursday.

Previously, the group said, there were 443 violations in 1996, 363 in 1995 and 340 in 1994.

The recent violations included instances in which military commanders "asked, pursued and harassed service members in direct violation of the limits to gay investigations under current policy," the report said.

It added that there "is a climate in many commands where 'anything goes' in the pursuit of suspected gay personnel. Commanders who want to do the right thing must swim up stream."

The group based its annual report on data provided by service members who went to the organization seeking legal aid.

A Pentagon spokesman declined to comment on the report, saying he had not yet seen it.

In 1993, after a bruising battle among the White House, the Joint Chiefs of Staff and Congress, the military adopted a policy of "don't ask, don't tell, don't pursue" regarding gay men and lesbians. The policy said homosexual activity would remain banned in the military, but that gays and lesbians may serve as long as they keep quiet about their sexual orientation.

Under the policy, gay recruits and troops cannot be asked about their sexual orientation unless commanders have "credible information" that they are actually engaged in homosexual conduct.

The previous Pentagon policy allowed commanders to make such queries without any direct evidence.

Last year the Pentagon told commanders that "credible information" must contain more than a simple accusation by one service member against another.

Despite that effort, the legal rights group said it has documented an increase in violations in which commanders were asking service members about their sexuality, pursuing them and harassing them.

For example, SLDN said that in 124 cases, commanders asked service members if they were homosexual without sufficient cause, up from 89 reported violations in 1996. It said it had documented 235 violations in which commanders investigated suspected homosexual troops without credible evidence, up from 191 the previous year. And it reported 182 anti-gay harassment incidents, including death threats and assaults, a 38 percent increase from the 132 incidents reported in 1996.

However, SLDN found that "don't tell" violations, in which military counselors or health care providers turned in suspected homosexual service members, had dropped significantly. There were 22 such violations in 1997, down from 31 in the previous year.

The report said that of all the military services, the Navy committed the most violations – 193 – of the Pentagon's policy.

The organization pointed to the case of Senior Chief Petty Officer Timothy McVeigh, a 17-year veteran based in Honolulu, as an example of the Navy going out of its way to invade the privacy of a suspected gay.

In January the Navy discharged McVeigh (no relation to the convicted Oklahoma City bomber) after investigators gained access to his e-mail user profile from American Online. In the profile, McVeigh said his marital status was "gay" and listed his hobbies as "driving, boy-watching, collecting pictures of other young studs."

The Navy was overruled by U.S. District Judge Stanley Sporkin, who said that the "Navy went too far" and had "violated the very essence of 'don't ask, don't pursue' by launching a search-and-destroy mission."

In another example, SLDN cited the case of Kevin Smith, a Marine Corps lance corporal who was hospitalized after being assaulted outside a gay bar in San Angelo, Texas, last September.

Smith's sergeant was more intent on determining whether the victim was gay than in tracking down his attackers, SLDN said. The sergeant pressed Smith about his sexuality, and fearing an investigation, Smith left the military.

The group also noted the case of an Air Force woman from Louisiana accused of being a lesbian by a former roommate, who later retracted the accusation and said it was false. But the woman was discharged anyway, "despite the lack of evidence," the report said.

Absent from this year's study was a tally of how many troops were discharged in 1997 because of homosexuality.

Kevin Winston, a spokesman for SLDN, said the Pentagon had yet to forward the statistics to the organization, as it had done since the homosexual policy went into effect.

In 1996, the Pentagon dismissed 850 gay and lesbian service members, up from 722 in 1995, 597 in 1994 and 682 in 1993, according to Pentagon statistics provided to SLDN.

Two drugs can nearly replace estrogen in osteoporosis treatment

WOMEN: Medications offer hope without side effects like breast cancer

By Katharine Webster
The Associated Press

A new study adds to evidence that an osteoporosis drug works nearly as well as estrogen in strengthening the bones of post-menopausal women.

A small dose of alendronate, sold under the brand name Fosamax, increased bone mineral density in the spines and hips of women ages 45 to 59, the age group in which bone loss is most rapid, the study by European and American researchers found.

Alendronate was the first non-hormonal drug shown to combat osteoporosis, a crippling disease that affects about 25 million Americans, mostly older women. It was approved by the federal Food and Drug Administration in late 1995.

Osteoporosis makes the bones fragile, greatly increasing the risk of broken hips and the small spinal fractures that cause painful, humped backs in many elderly women. In elderly women, broken hips are one of the leading causes of hospitalization, and complications from such breaks are a leading cause of death.

Previous studies have shown that alendronate slows bone loss and helps prevent broken bones in women who already suffer from osteoporosis.

This study, which was supported by the maker of Fosamax, is the first to show that alendronate also can prevent the disease, said Dr. Beth Dawson-Hughes, an osteoporosis researcher at Tufts University who was not involved in the study.

"Estrogen in my view would be the first line (treatment), not only because it prevents bone loss, but it prevents the progression of heart disease ... and alleviates menopausal symptoms," Dawson-Hughes said.

However, many women will not take estrogen because of its side effects and a modest increase in the risk of breast cancer, making alendronate a good alternative, she said.

Another promising alternative is the recently approved drug raloxifene, sold by Eli Lilly & Co. as Evista. This drug, so-called designer estrogen, protects bones but does not increase the risk of breast cancer. Like alendronate, it does not prevent heart disease, but researchers hope to develop a designer estrogen that will, Dawson-Hughes said.

The study, published in Thursday's New England Journal of Medicine, was designed to find the lowest dose of alendronate that would maintain or increase bone density in the majority of post-menopausal women.

It found that women taking 5 milligrams daily could benefit while suffering no more side effects than those taking a dummy pill. The usual dose

Churches institute measures designed to attract men

RELIGION: Attempt to get more males to worship calls for all new tactics

By Diego Ribadeneira
The Boston Globe

For decades women have outnumbered men when it comes to filling church pews. For many congregations, the Norman Rockwell painting of a mother and child heading to church while dad ducks behind a newspaper is as accurate as it is funny.

But today, finding out what men want out of church and offering it has become a top priority for many Protestant churches around the country.

Increasingly, churches have concluded that one of their best chances to boost membership is to reach out to men whose wives and children already attend. In many cities some churches are seeking out more men to serve as mentors in anti-drug and anti-violence programs in troubled communities.

Churches are reaching out with everything from basketball leagues, to male-only Bible classes and prayer groups, to fathering classes.

"A lot of churches realize they haven't done a great job paying attention to men and that they have to do something about it," said Edward Colzack, a Dallas consultant who helps churches increase their membership. "Men's ministries has become one of the buzzwords in church circles."

The growth in men's ministries is primarily among evangelical and, to a lesser degree, mainline Protestant churches, although some Catholic parishes and Jewish congregations also have begun efforts to attract men.

West Congregational Church in Haverhill, Mass., for instance, hired an assistant pastor three years ago whose main responsibility was to bring more men into the church. Today, just about every man in the 600-member church is involved in some type of ministry or church-affiliated group.

Greater Love Tabernacle Church in Boston's Mission Hill neighborhood has drawn scores of new male members in recent years through programs including prison ministries, street evangelizing and men's fellowships.

"All these groups have brought the brothers closer and we really support each other like a family," said Monty Bynoe, who joined the church two years ago. "When you're in these ministries, you get to know people on a much more personal level, and it gives you a stronger relationship to the church."

At Resurrection Lutheran Church in Boston's Roxbury neighborhood, several men's groups, including a monthly breakfast discussion, have been launched in the past four years.

"We realized that we weren't doing enough to appeal to men and to take advantage of the resources they could bring," said the Rev. John Heinemeier. Among other things, these new groups mentor boys in the neighborhood and help provide fathering classes to men who are involved with Roxbury District Court and are on probation.

Before the outreach, more than 80 percent of the church's new members were women. Now, almost half the new members are men, Heinemeier says. About 125 people regularly attend Sunday services.

Pastors and scholars say churches traditionally have counted on the support of women, both in membership and in congregational life. Several recent national studies show that from 60 percent to 67 percent of members in Christian churches are women, according to Carl S. Dudley, codirector of the center for social and religious research at Hartford Seminary in Connecticut.

"Women have been the staple of the typical congregation," said Jay Demerath, a sociologist of religion at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst.

The reasons for the differences in church membership and participation between men and women, religion scholars say, have to do with sociology and psychology.

Historically, as men entered the work force and women stayed home, church became the place where women could find a community of like-minded people. The church became for women what the corner saloon or union hall was for men: a place to socialize, commiserate and talk about life issues.

And as women took on the main parenting role in families, they tended to assume responsibility for taking their children to church and to Sunday school.

Men and women also have differed in their motivations to get involved in church, the scholars say. Women are more likely to respond to traditional church activities such as praying, singing and preaching. Men tend to be more interested in a program that makes what they hear from the pulpit relevant to their lives.

"Our experience has shown that a good way to keep men interested is giving them something that goes beyond just preaching or singing," said the Rev. William E. Dickerson, pastor of Greater Love Tabernacle Church in Mission Hill.

The emphasis on attracting men is, in part, a by-product of the religious renaissance in America. Many families again are looking to churches to instill strong morals in their children. But pastors say that in many churches, much of this responsibility still is shouldered by women. Women, for example, are much more likely to volunteer as Sunday school teachers.

Another important factor influencing churches' approach toward men has been the success of the Promise Keepers, a national men's ministry that has attracted hundreds of thousands to stadiums for prayer and fellowship. The growth of the Promise Keepers has made many pastors feel that men may have been neglected.

Many urban churches have used community-service programs with tutors or mentors as a way to enroll men. Greater Love Tabernacle, for example, has a ministry called "Who

Divisions in African American community threaten museum dreams

CULTURE: Despite need for historical monument, actions continue to stall

By Natalie Hopkinson
Cox News Service

WASHINGTON — Steve Newsome always knows February is near by the rash of inquiries deluging his office.

As director of the Anacostia Museum and the Center for African American History and Culture – the lone sector of the Smithsonian Institution devoted to the African American experience – Newsome's services are in high demand during Black History Month.

And like clockwork, each year someone reopens a 14-year-old question: Whatever happened to the National African American Museum Project?

Conceived in 1984 by a Washington African American businessman, the museum was to be the mother of all African American museums, a national establishment devoted to celebrating African American heritage amid Washington's glittery monuments and museums on the Mall.

But Congress, faced with skillful opposition from Sen. Jesse Helms, R-N.C., refused to charter the museum.

Instead, in 1995, the Smithsonian Institution attached what was left of the project to Newsome's 31-year-old Anacostia Museum, a small, community-driven museum located in predominantly African American southeastern Washington.

The museum project became the Center for African American History and Culture, sharing space with the two-room Anacostia Museum and its $2.7 million budget. The center also sends small exhibits to one of the major Smithsonian museums on a revolving basis.

To some African American leaders and academics, the derailment of the dream of a national African American museum is an affront to African American culture.

"There is a glaring omission here in the capital of the United States," said Thomas Battle, director of Howard University's Moorland Springarn Center, which has one of the largest collections of research material on African American life in America.

"The current effort is not satisfactory or sufficient," he said. "The Anacostia Museum is a stepchild of the Smithsonian."

Battle, who participated in a board assembled in 1990 by the Smithsonian to decide what form the proposed museum should take, says the blame for its failure to be born lay with the institution's mostly white directors who weren't seriously committed to having an African American presence on the Mall.

> Despite the continuing divide, many ... say the museum idea should be pursued aggressively.

African American leaders weren't surprised by the Smithsonian's apparent lack of enthusiasm. The institution, which assembled the nation's largest consortium of museums in the first place, failed to include the folks who gave America centuries of free labor.

But the history of the effort to create the museum suggests that neither the Smithsonian nor Congress deserves all the blame for the project's failure.

A more familiar dynamic appears to have doomed the project at its inception: the notion that descendants of Africa still can't decide whether they are American or African American.

This basic contradiction in African American life created the need for a separate museum, and – as this month reminds us – a separate history month.

When Washington businessman Tom Mack proposed the idea of building a museum devoted to the history and culture of African Americans 14 years ago, two factions of African American supporters battled over who should tell the story.

Mack and his allies criticized the Smithsonian as a racist institution incapable of doing justice to African American culture. They advocated raising the money themselves and limiting the Smithsonian's authority over the project.

But the Smithsonian lined up a prominent group of African American thinkers who argued that the institution should build the museum – with federal money – because it had an obligation to represent all facets of American life.

Two competing organizations were formed. Black Congress members were recruited by each side. Eventually, two different bills to establish the museum hit Capitol Hill in the early 1990s.

So before Helms scuttled the effort for a national museum in 1994, the divisions in the African American community had already seriously weakened the dream.

This thread of contradiction – African Americans first or Americans first – is woven into much of the history that African Americans learn.

In the early 1900s, W.E.B. Dubois argued for greater African American integration into the American culture, while Booker T. Washington preached entrepreneurship and self-reliance for the African American community. By mid-century, civil rights leader Martin Luther King Jr. was dueling with African American power advocate Malcolm X. Today, the Rev. Jesse Jackson's Rainbow Coalition approach rivals Minister Louis Farrakhan's Nation of Islam.

Despite the continuing divide, many African American thinkers and political leaders say the museum idea should be pursued aggressively.

"Because so much of the black experience has been left out, the need is still there," said Leroy Davis, a history professor at Emory University. "We can't pretend that the black experience

"Since I entered college I've been on the big identity search. Who am I? What's my purpose? Where am I going?

But, there was one question I never wanted to ask. The one about my Jewish identity. It simply didn't interest me.

So, last year around this time I met a guy. He had depth, intellect, and a warm, embracing soul. He told me about this place with mountains and forests, horses and hiking trails outside L.A. where he had spent nearly four weeks during the previous summer. He said it had changed his life, awakened his intellect and his Jewish soul. I thought, 'no thanks, not for me.'

Then I realized I was envious of what he seemed to have. So I did something I swore I'd never do. I went. And it was the best thing I ever did. I met other people just like me. We all shared an experience so deep and meaningful I can't imagine we will ever be out of contact with one another.

Night and day, we discussed the most profound questions with brilliant, world-renowned scholars. We delved into the arts, study, nature. All of it through an open, pluralistic approach, within a Jewish context.

The place is called the Brandeis Collegiate Institute. It's where I discovered who I really am."

The Brandeis Collegiate Institute (BCI) was founded by Supreme Court Justice Louis D. Brandeis for men and women ages 18-26. BCI alumni have moved into leadership positions in American society and the Jewish community, creating life-long connections with people of values, committed to Jewish life. Sessions for this summer are filling up rapidly.

INDICTMENT

there. The nuns testified the temple destroyed or altered records to avoid embarrassment.

Gore has said he did not know it was a fund-raising event, but a draft report by the Senate panel concludes it should have been obvious to him.

"The matters for which Ms. Hsia has been indicted do not involve Vice President Gore," said Gore spokesman Christopher Lehane. "This is now a question for the courts, and we are confident fairness will be done."

But mindful of the potential political fallout, a Gore aide said any efforts by partisan opponents in the future to taint the vice president would be "cynical efforts to exploit the issue for a cheap political gain."

Clinton's 1996 opponent, Bob Dole, and Presidents Bush and Reagan all had political supporters and personal friends convicted of crimes, but the public did not blame those politicians, said a Gore aide, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

The six-count indictment alleges that Hsia, a 47-year-old immigration consultant, conspired to defraud the United States and caused false statements about the contributions' source to be filed by campaign committees with the Federal Election Commission.

Hsia's attorney, Nancy Luque, has denied that her client, a Taiwan-born U.S. citizen and California resident, violated the law and has said she will fight any charges.

Hsia was expected to surrender here Thursday for arraignment.

> The grand jury charged that ... monks and nuns, Hsia's clients and Hsia herself posed as the donors of contributions.

Specifically, the grand jury charged that corporate money belonging to the temple was used to make disguised and illegal campaign contributions to federal, state and local candidates.

The grand jury charged that temple monks and nuns, temple volunteers, Hsia's clients and Hsia herself posed as the donors of contributions but were reimbursed with money from the temple.

The straw contributions were given to the Democratic National Committee; Clinton-Gore '96; the 1994 re-election campaign of Sen. Kennedy, D-Mass.; the 1996 re-election campaign of Rep. Patrick Kennedy, D-R.I.; Democrat March Fong Eu's 1994 campaign for re-election as California secretary of state; and Republican Don Knabe's 1996 campaign for Los Angeles County supervisor.

The conspiracy count specifically mentions the temple fund-raiser attended by Gore and $55,000 in contributions it says Hsia solicited a day later from 11 individuals associated with the temple. It adds that contributions totaling $10,000 that Hsia arranged before the event also were reimbursed.

The indictment mentions $8,000 in contributions to Sen. Kennedy; $5,000 in contributions to his son, Rep. Patrick Kennedy; $90,000 in misreported contributions to the Democratic National Committee; $14,000 in misreported contributions to Clinton-Gore '96; $1,500 in contributions to Knabe; and $500 to March Fong Eu.

On Jan. 29, the campaign finance task force indicted Charlie Trie, a former Little Rock, Ark., restaurateur and longtime Clinton friend, and his associate, Antonio Pan, on fund-raising charges. Trie returned from abroad earlier this month and pleaded innocent.

hasn't been portrayed in a stereotypical way or not at all."

Davis pointed out that other ethnic groups, such as Native Americans and victims of the Holocaust, have achieved congressional approval for a museum on or near the mall in Washington.

The National Museum of the American Indian was chartered by Congress and is slated to open, under the Smithsonian's auspices, in 2002.

Although not affiliated with the Smithsonian, the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum won unanimous approval from Congress after no debate. Paid for by private contributors, the building opened on federal property in 1993.

Today, Rep. John Lewis, D-Ga., continues to introduce legislation to charter an African American history museum that wouldn't require any federal money. But each year Congress refuses to take up his bill.

With no help from Congress in sight, it seems that if a national African American museum is to be built in Washington, African Americans will have to do it themselves.

has given its conditional support for the trip, White House press secretary Mike McCurry said earlier today: "We're just not going to willingly accept whatever results from this mission. We want to be able to look at it and make sure that it fulfills what we think are the principles that apply."

Annan will leave Thursday and arrive in Baghdad on Friday. Annan said he would meet directly with Saddam over the weekend.

In announcing his decision, Annan said he didn't ask for a mandate from the Security Council's five permanent members – the United States, Britain, France, Russia and China – but did seek clear direction about what he could discuss with the Iraqis.

Russian President Boris Yeltsin said today the visit was "extremely important," the ITAR-Tass news agency reported.

Foreign Ministry spokesman Valery Nesterushkin said Annan's visit would not be the last chance for a peaceful settlement, according to the Interfax news agency.

Baghdad has blocked inspectors from gaining access to eight so-called presidential sites, arguing they represent symbols of Iraqi sovereignty.

The inspectors must certify that Iraq has destroyed its long-range missiles and weapons of mass destruction before the council will lift crippling economic sanctions imposed in 1990, when Saddam's troops invaded Kuwait, touching off the 1991 Gulf War.

Iraq claims it has destroyed all banned weapons and that the special commission has deceived the council to keep the sanctions in place.

Several formulas have been proposed. One would have inspectors from the special commission, known as UNSCOM, be accompanied by diplomats on visits to presidential sites.

Others would have Annan appoint a new group of inspectors, some of which could be from UNSCOM. Iraq has also insisted on a 60-day time-limit for inspections, something the United States and Britain have rejected.

In Baghdad, Saddam's Revolution Command Council and the ruling Ba'ath Party issued a statement Tuesday pledging to "exert all serious and legitimate effort" to find a peaceful solution.

The statement did not offer any concessions that might avert an attack.

DENG

labor force, Jiang and his colleagues are taking risks Deng contemplated but never dared.

Unemployment, already as high as 15 million in the cities, could double in the next two years, a once unthinkable event in a society that promised lifetime jobs.

At the same time, 130 million peasants, freed from land-bound toil by Deng's, end to collective farming, are looking for work, many of them in the cities.

In Deng's day, "All levels of society benefited from the reforms. Society held really peaceful and stable.

"After Deng, that phenomenon of all levels benefiting in lock step has ended," said Wang, the author.

"The reforms have created many social differences. After Deng, solving social problems has become a headache," he added.

The migrants who gather at an unofficial labor market on the Yongding Gate overpass in Beijing are near the bottom of the new social ladder. Peasants all, they come from farms too small – often no more than three-quarters of an acre – to support their families.

About the best that Cui said he can hope for is to earn about $12 a month by finding a day or two of carpentry work a week.

"Even college graduates can't get jobs these days," said Cui, who came to Beijing from a small farm on the dusty northern Shandong plain, 150 miles to the southeast.

Chinese leaders have responded with programs to improve social welfare, campaigns to promote communist thrift and a police crackdown on migrants without work.

Cui and other migrants believe the situation will worsen before improving. But they seem resigned to the hardships as another phase in China's 20-year reform effort.

A recognition of the necessity of reform, even by those who feel left behind, may be the best guarantee of future success. Deng thought so.

His daughter, Deng Lin, said in an essay published Wednesday in Beijing newspapers that her father remained unshaken when some called for his ouster during the "crazy winds and evil waves" of 1989 – a reference to the Tiananmen Square democracy protests and the crackdown Deng ordered.

"Father said they may be shouting the slogan 'down with Deng Xiaoping' but they are not shouting 'down with reform and openness,'" Deng Lin wrote.

were selling the store's inventory.

"We were dismantling our lives and we didn't know what life we were facing," said Tokuda, born in Seattle as the oldest of four children.

It was May 1942, several months after the relocation order, and it was her neighborhood's turn to be evacuated. Everyone left quietly.

"There's no way to describe it," Tokuda said. "A kind of numbness settled over us. There were no words on the bus to Puyallup. It was so depressed.

"All I saw were tears coming down my mother's cheek. I guess it was sadness, fear and exhaustion all mixed together."

The family was housed in a small empty barrack room. Being young and – she says – "buoyant," she eventually adjusted to camp life in Puyallup and Minidoka, Idaho.

But she still finds it painful to remember what interned adults went through.

"I think about my dad," Tokuda said. "He worked so hard to start his store (named Togo Clothing after a Japanese war hero). And then to lose it all and have to go to work as a janitor after the war."

At the time, she did not feel a deep resentment against a society in which Japanese Americans "were already segregated and treated as second-class citizens." But now, she feels it is important to remember the breach of civil rights.

"It means a lot to us (Japanese Americans) now," Tokuda said. "The constitution is what you make it."

·Every once in a while, Irwin Yoshimura opens the yearbook his family made during their time at the Minidoka internment camp. He turns the tattered pages to the picture of Block 40 and looks at his parents, grandparents, aunts, uncles, himself and his younger brother posing in front of the barrack where they lived.

"I think how it was and how everyone made the best of it," said Yoshimura, 58, who was 3 when his family was evacuated from Beacon Hill to Puyallup.

But he said there is also a sadness when he looks at his young working-class parents and his grandparents.

Like many former internees too young to remember the pain of being uprooted, Yoshimura does recall how older generations struggled after the war to get their lost lives back on track, how they had to sell their belongings at rock-bottom prices and had nothing when they came back.

"They worked awfully hard," said Yoshimura, now human resources specialist at the corporate office of Uwajimaya. "I don't think they ever had a chance to enjoy life."

Yoshimura can't recall his family's evacuation to Puyallup. But he remembers how life for kids in Minidoka was marked by baseball, Boy Scouts and dances.

"I remember catching grasshoppers," he said. "Once, I sat on a cactus. It was very painful."

His parents didn't encourage their children to dwell on the past. Despite their hardships, they rarely talked about life in the camps. Yoshimura's mother, who died from a stroke at a young age after the war, would only say that she was often the target of racial slurs when she took the boys for a walk in a stroller before their evacuation.

"Yes, internment was an injustice," he said. "But it may have been the safest thing for us (at the time)."

·Ruth Kataoka was 17 when Roosevelt's executive order was announced. She lived with her parents and three sisters on a farm near Sumner, where the family grew raspberries, rhubarb, peas, beans and other vegetables.

She too felt some relief because anti-Japanese sentiment whipped up by the media had prompted locals to drive by and throw a bottle at her family's home.

"There was a lot of belligerence," said Kataoka, now 73. "After we left, people broke in and took things. Then, the house was set on fire. I didn't think I wanted to live around there."

attack on Pearl Harbor, so when the evacuation order came for her area "the rest of us went like sheep."

"Our parents were from Meiji-era (1868-1912) Japan – very obedient to authority," she said. "We (children) weren't outspoken as young people are today. We were very conforming, made sure we were not too conspicuous."

The family took what they could carry. Kataoka's father gave his car to a friend who drove them to Puyallup. At the fairgrounds, she worked in the mess hall office and met her future husband.

They were transferred to Minidoka in August. Japanese Americans had options to leave the camps. They could find a job or a college away from the coast or volunteer for military service in one of several segregated units sent overseas.

Being young and "adventurous," Kataoka found a college professor in Salt Lake City who sponsored her to study nursing there. Her husband signed up as a soldier and was trained in military intelligence at Fort Snelling near Minneapolis.

"Volunteering (for armed services) was quite controversial in the camps," Kataoka said. "Many parents were pro-Japanese, but most encouraged their sons to be loyal to the country they were born in."

The couple married in St. Paul in 1944 before he was sent to the Philippines. He died a month ago at age 81.

"A lot of young people went inland or to the East Coast, where there wasn't as much prejudice," Kataoka said. "I think what it (relocation and internment) did is spread everybody out across the country."

·At the time of Pearl Harbor, Katashi Oita lived in California like tens of thousands of other Japanese Americans. He was a chemistry student at the University of California, Berkeley.

His parents, brother and two younger sisters lived in Watsonville near the coast. After the Japanese attack, it was feared that Japanese-Americans would spy for the enemy, so the family was ordered to move inland. They took up residence with his older sister, who lived in a part of Watsonville 5 miles from the Pacific.

When the evacuation order came, the family went to the rodeo grounds in Salinas before they were transferred to a camp in Poston, Ariz.

"I didn't think as much about my civil rights as about the safety of the United States," said Oita, who was hired as a chemist by Weyerhaeuser in the 1960s. "At the time, we trusted the government and believed they must have had a good reason (to relocate Japanese Americans)."

A year after their relocation, however, he and many other Japanese Americans began to realize that spying allegations against their community were largely fabricated and he became angry about their internment.

The American Friends Service Committee, a Quaker organization, provided food, clothing, medicine, job placements, scholarships and homes to many Japanese Americans during the war. With their help, he found work as a houseboy in Chicago. The Quakers later helped him go back to college. Eventually, he received a doctorate in chemistry.

His success in education left Oita, now retired, with mixed feelings about his treatment during World War II.

"The internment was based on paranoia and our parents lost what they worked for," he said. "But it took us (younger Japanese Americans) out of the ghetto. It opened up a new world for us."

·On the day she was evacuated, Masako Tomita, now 69, recalls babysitting her younger brothers while her parents gathered their belongings from the family's rented home in the Central Area. It was three months after Roosevelt's executive order.

"It was a beautiful day, but it wasn't happy by any means," said Tomita, who was a 14-year-old Garfield High School student at the time. "My mother cried when we left the house. She was scared."

Otherwise, her parents "were quiet and stoic – didn't say anything," she said. "I think I would have been outraged."

But Puyallup and Minidoka weren't bad for young people, said Tomita, now nutrition program manager at the Nisei (second-generation Japanese Americans) Veterans Club just east of the International District.

She went to Girl Scout camps, learned to dance and helped harvest potatoes. "We didn't dwell on the bad things."

It wasn't until the 1960s, when Congress passed civil rights acts banning many forms of discrimination against minorities, that Tomita "was educated about the injustice" of her internment.

"After that, it was difficult for me to talk about camp," she said. "I would choke up."

Although the money each former internee received in 1988 didn't begin to make up for the material and emotional losses Japanese Americans suffered during the war, Tomita felt it was a landmark victory for her community.

"The only way to make Americans realize the injustice of what was done was to make them pay," she said.

But despite the government's apology, "there is still an atmosphere of prejudice in the United States" and too often ethnic groups become targets of discrimination, Tomita said.

That is now the main reason Tomita said she remembers the day Roosevelt signed her evacuation order.

OSTEOPOROSIS

for people already suffering from osteoporosis is 10 milligrams, but that can lead to side effects including abdominal pain, acid indigestion and nausea.

Dawson-Hughes said she is reserving judgment on whether side effects are as insignificant as the study suggests, since previous research also found few side effects "and yet people's clinical experience using the drug is that many people cannot tolerate it."

The study looked at two groups of women over two years of treatment.

In the first group, 1,070 women were randomly assigned to take either 5 milligrams or 2.5 milligrams of alendronate, or a dummy pill. Women taking the higher dose gained bone in the spine, hips and total body; those taking the lower dose gained some bone in the spine and hips and stayed about level in total bone density. Women who took the dummy pill lost bone everywhere.

In the second group, 390 women took an estrogen-progestin combination, 5 milligrams or 2.5 milligrams of alendronate, or a dummy pill. Women taking the higher dose of alendronate had gains in bone density that were nearly as good as those taking estrogen-progestin. The lower dose of alendronate was not as effective, but still was significantly better than the dummy pill.

The study was led by Dr. David Hosking of City Hospital in Nottingham, England, and supported by Merck Research Laboratories of Rahway, N.J., which makes Fosamax.

are You" that works with middle-school students on life skills.

"Obviously these are broad generalizations, but research has shown that men have a more activist strain," said Garth Baker-Fletcher, a professor at Claremont School of Theology in Claremont, Calif. "Even if it's just fixing the church sign or painting the church, that's something that churches have done to get men interested. It builds camaraderie and gets men inside the church."

At Tree of Life Gospel Church in Springfield, Mass., church leaders organized a basketball league two years ago to draw neighborhood men. As a result, about a dozen men decided to join the 250-member congregation.

"It was hoops and then after the game we had a 45-minute prayer group and Bible talk," said the Rev. Dale Conners. "We didn't force anybody to stay, but these guys had already become pals through the game so they were more willing to hang around and talk about Jesus."

Perhaps the most successful strategy for attracting men as well as women, religious scholars say, has been the creation of small groups within congregations. That means moving beyond prayer groups and Bible studies to offer programs for divorced men, singles and business executives, as at Grace Chapel in Lexington, Mass., for example.

"The more things you have on the menu, the better," said David Midwood, pastor of West Congregational Church in Haverhill. "Everything isn't for everyone, but hopefully there is something for everyone."

of seismology in the department of earth and space science. "It affects the direction they're going and their amplitude."

The stiffer, colder mantle conducts the waves at a higher velocity compared to the pools of mushier, molten rock near the core-mantle boundary, Vidale said.

The characterization of this region offers new insight into the unconventional behavior of the liquid rock as it migrates throughout the earth's inner layers.

"Convection of mantle is the driving force behind earthquakes," said Whitcomb.

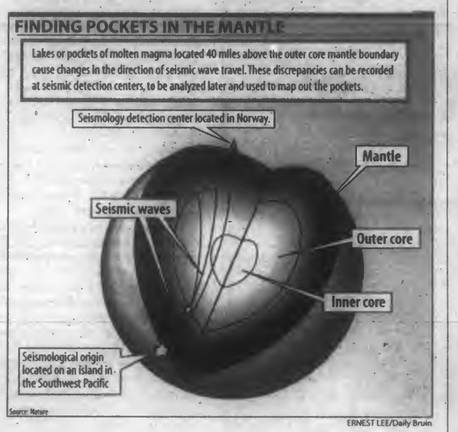
As scientists learn more about the dynamic relationship between shifting temperatures and densities in the core-mantle boundary, the more they understand the behavior of earthquakes, Whitcomb said.

In the meantime, scientists diversify their research efforts so they can attack different angles of seismology.

Michael Hedlin is currently studying how the heterogenities in the mantle vary across the earth by comparing different sets of data to the global average.

This, he realizes, will be one more step to understanding earthquakes.

"Science moves in little jumps, and this might get us a little closer," concluded Hedlin.



REAL BRUINS

After the opening rush, the eight-year ASUCLA employee poured himself a cup of coffee, the only one he would drink that day.

"The employees freak when I drink more," he joked.

While going over time cards in his small office at the coffeehouse, cluttered with backpacks, coffee mugs and Dilbert comic strips, Newlove talked about some of the problems that come with managing 120 student employees.

"When we get into midterms and finals, this is what happens to the number of people who call in sick," Newlove explained, drawing a graph with the highest peaks of sick calls during the exam weeks.

He said that presents a problem when there's not enough employees to handle the long lines of customers.

And Kerckhoff Coffeehouse does gets its fair share of lines, as the financial statistics clearly show.

After punching in the sales figures for the previous day in his computer, Newlove said the the coffeehouse brought in $5,367, 9.4 percent better than the figure for the same day the previous year.

Newlove predicted the coffeehouse will serve 510,000 customers this year.

Viewpoint doesn't see such a high number of customers or profits. In fact, Newlove said that most of the time, "it just breaks even."

At Viewpoint Cafe, a short while before, it opened its lines to students, Newlove tried to get everything into place.

"How's it going?" he asked the employees as he made his way over. "Can you make sure we have all the biscotti out and more chocolate to the front. Also, wear your name tag."

While there, Newlove checked up on the adjacent mini-bakery where everyday at 6 a.m., Antonio, the baker, bakes some of the fresh pastries.

Any food that doesn't get sold, Newlove said, is donated to the Hunger Project, a UCLA community service organization.

After checking up on Viewpoint Cafe, Newlove took the stairs back up – a journey he would make more than five times by the afternoon.

"Later in the day, the elevators are useless," he said, "the doors open up and it's already packed."

Back in the office in Kerckhoff, Newlove used the downtime to do some office work.

"The one thing about this restaurant is I don't have an office staff," he said, "I have to do it all."

Newlove previously worked with Marriot Hotel as a hotel restaurant manager, a business in which his wife is also involved. It was when he got married that he landed at UCLA.

After his honeymoon, Newlove was hospitalized with pneumonia for five days. "Marriot got pissed," he explained, "so I sent an application to ASUCLA."

Of the two locales, Newlove prefers the Bruin campus.

However, keeping the balance between work and family life is one strain Newlove must endure.

"I have a two-and-a-half-year-old daughter who goes to bed at 7:30 every night," Newlove said, "and there's a little boy on his way. That's the hardest part. Like last night, I only got to see my daughter for 10 minutes."

On the other hand, the opportunity to build friendships with students is the sweetener in his espresso – it makes the job easier to handle.

Newlove pulled out a letter he had recently received from a former employee, thanking him for the help he had given her on writing a resume.

"That's what makes my job really cool, that totally made my day," he said, beaming.

The manager no doubt takes advantage of the chance to make friends. Walking up and down Kerckhoff Hall proves that.

Each time he switched stations, he knew someone and their story.

Around the 9 a.m. rush, Newlove hovered around the coffeehouse counter.

Waiting in line was Scott Chandler, one of the two people with whom Newlove shares the privilege of choosing the coffee of the month.

The professor in the physiological sciences department bought a cup of joe and talked with Newlove.

"He runs a tight ship," Chandler said.

According to the manager, he and Chandler often go kayaking and work out together.

"(Chandler) comes in twice a day," Newlove said, "for his LS (life sciences) 2 class, he gives the students a list of questions, and if they come in here and answer them right, they get a free mug. Last time, we gave away 300 mugs."

The smaller third of Newlove's duties include overseeing the cart out on the Kerckhoff Patio.

Newlove walked out and made sure all the umbrellas were up and the sandwiches were out. Throughout the day he made periodic checks to keep everything running smoothly.

"At lunchtime the cart picks up," he said. "It's almost like a safety valve for people who just want brewed coffee."

Aside from monitoring the three coffee outlets, the coffee machines, the temperatures of freezers and soup warmers, Newlove must keep an extremely weighty worry in his mind: theft.

"There's been some theft of cash and giving away of food," he said. "Students don't realize they must go to the dean. It's a big deal. One non-student was arrested last year."

A camera in the coffeehouse was put in as a deterrent, and Newlove said it has been somewhat effective.

Counterfeit has recently been a problem, not just within Kerckhoff Coffeehouse but in other ASUCLA markets as well.

"Someone has been passing counterfeit money," Newlove said while picking up a reserve bag in an Ackerman office. "It counts as a shortage for us because we can't redeem it. They try to pass it off when it gets really busy."

Newlove said the coffeehouse alone has lost approximately $80, while the whole system has suffered a loss of about $500.

Checking for counterfeit money can be cumbersome when a long line of irritated, caffeine-addicted, sleep-deprived students are waiting. And lines in Kerckhoff happen often.

Every now and then, to alleviate the pressure caused by the students stacking up, Newlove acted as "barrista," a title given to the person who operates the espresso machine behind the counter.

Later on, when things on campus began to wind down, the tables and chairs were full of students with open books, empty cups of coffee and half-eaten bagels.

Behind the counter a "suicide bagel" was stuck between the tray and glass. When Newlove saw the troubled bread item, he asked a cashier to remove it.

The plunging baked good reminded him of other bagel problems.

"Some of them look so similar, like the sun-dried tomato and vegetable ones," he said. "We stopped selling chocolate chip bagels because they looked just like the blueberry ones."

If a basketball game is scheduled, Newlove will head on over to operate a small part of the total concessions at Pauley.

While the seats in Pauley Saturday were empty, Newlove ran around getting uniform shirts for all the employees, taking inventory of the food, making sure both regular and Kosher hot dogs were stocked at the stand, and keeping the stand, located by the exit, far enough away to meet fire code regulations.

"The purpose of management here, is mainly to give support, like cheerleading," he said. "It's just nice to get out of the coffeehouse."

Throughout the whole time, before and during the game, Newlove was climbing up and down the Pauley steps. If he ever entered a stairmaster competition, this guy would win.

"My worst nightmare is falling down the stairs during a game on national television," he said, shaking his head.

"He's probably one of the best bosses I have had," said Gil Cardon, a fifth-year sociology student and senior student supervisor for Newlove. "He has the necessary technical skills and knowledge of a good manager."

For Newlove, it's more than that.

"It's working with the students that I like the most, it's what makes it different from the rest," Newlove said, "This isn't just a dead-end job. If they want, students can get a lot out of this."

PORNO

According to Cross, the Vice Squad has also visited this residence.

"A couple of years ago, we did shoot something in the backyard but it's totally secluded," Cross said. Throughout the years, the house has been the location where several models for the videos were interviewed, in which "they tend to wear alluring clothing."

These events could perhaps be responsible for the anonymous phone calls that Cross received at the house.

"The things she said were highly sexist and racist," Cross said. He feels they were close to harassment.

But one Westwood homeowner is looking past the tenant to the landlord of the Weyburn building: Ira Smedra.

Jackie Freedman, co-president of the Holmby-Westwood Property Owners Association, had heard that there was a pornography business in the Village. After walking by the location, she became suspicious and called the vice squad.

Outside of her disapproval of this sort of tenant in the village, she looks to the property's owner, Ira Smedra, as the one who is responsible.

"It shows disregard to the village," Freedman said. "And he has left the property in deplorable conditions."

But Smedra insists that he had no idea who was renting the small 200 square-foot office space from him and only spoke to someone at the office for the very first time last week.

His agent took care of the lease with Hot Body International, who claimed they were a telemarketing company, a business Smedra considered legitimate.

"It is to some degree telemarketing," Cross said. "It is direct marketing; we ship things there."

When Smedra spoke to a Hot Body employee last week, he was told that tapes were distributed from the office but there is no filming taking place there.

"Everything is fine. It's not like business is being done there. It's not like it is a studio. There is nothing sinister going on there," Cross said.

But Smedra doesn't understand how the residents discovered what was going on in the Weyburn office. "If the homeowners know what the man is selling, then they must be buying it," he said.

Despite just being a distribution center, Smedra evicted Hot Body International at the beginning of this month, giving the company 60 days to find another distribution center. "We don't allow adult uses," he simply stated.

Throughout the whole time, before and during the game, Newlove was climbing up and down the Pauley steps. If he ever entered a stairmaster competition, this guy would win.

"My worst nightmare is falling down the stairs during a game on national television," he said, shaking his head.

"He's probably one of the best bosses I have had," said Gil Cardon, a fifth-year sociology student and senior student supervisor for Newlove. "He has the necessary technical skills and knowledge of a good manager."

For Newlove, it's more than that.

"It's working with the students that I like the most, it's what makes it different from the rest," Newlove said, "This isn't just a dead-end job. If they want, students can get a lot out of this."

According to Cross, the Vice Squad has also visited this residence.

"A couple of years ago, we did shoot something in the backyard but it's totally secluded," Cross said. Throughout the years, the house has been the location where several models for the videos were interviewed, in which "they tend to wear alluring clothing."

These events could perhaps be responsible for the anonymous phone calls that Cross received at the house.

"The things she said were highly sexist and racist," Cross said. He feels they were close to harassment.

But one Westwood homeowner is looking past the tenant to the landlord of the Weyburn building: Ira Smedra.

Jackie Freedman, co-president of the Holmby-Westwood Property Owners Association, had heard that there was a pornography business in the Village. After walking by the location, she became suspicious and called the vice squad.

Outside of her disapproval of this sort of tenant in the village, she looks to the property's owner, Ira Smedra, as the one who is responsible.

"It shows disregard to the village," Freedman said. "And he has left the property in deplorable conditions."

But Smedra insists that he had no idea who was renting the small 200 square-foot office space from him and only spoke to someone at the office for the very first time last week.

His agent took care of the lease with Hot Body International, who claimed they were a telemarketing company, a business Smedra considered legitimate.

"It is to some degree telemarketing," Cross said. "It is direct marketing; we ship things there."

When Smedra spoke to a Hot Body employee last week, he was told that tapes were distributed from the office but there is no filming taking place there.

"Everything is fine. It's not like business is being done there. It's not like it is a studio. There is nothing sinister going on there," Cross said.

But Smedra doesn't understand how the residents discovered what was going on in the Weyburn office. "If the homeowners know what the man is selling, then they must be buying it," he said.

Despite just being a distribution center, Smedra evicted Hot Body International at the beginning of this month, giving the company 60 days to find another distribution center. "We don't allow adult uses," he simply stated.

THUMBS UP THUMBS DOWN

Getting your money for free

Thumbs up to a Senate bill proposing an all-out ban on ATM surcharges, regardless of the machine's owner or location. Because many students are on fixed and low incomes, and have many banks from home-town accounts, students have been hit hardest by the outrageous ATM service charges.

Arrests ignore the problem

Thumbs down to the arrest of three students at Michigan State University on Feb. 10. Seven members of Movimiento Estudiantil Xicano de Aztlan participated in the protest minutes after MSU Provost Lou Anna Simon welcomed students to MSU President M. Peter McPherson's State of the University address. The protesters shouted, "Give us the Chicano studies program now, or are you afraid of an educated Chicano?"

Officers were called in to arrest the protesters because they interrupted a planned university event, which is a misdemeanor. The university and McPherson has long been criticized by students and local residents due to the university's poor retention of Latino and Chicano students and because of the lack of a Chicano studies program.

Nixing rights.

Thumbs down to the repeal of a gay-rights law passed last spring in Maine. The campaign to put an end to gay rights found lots of support from rural portions of the state, while supporters of gay rights won in urban areas.

Conservative religious groups failed in an anti-gay rights vote two years ago and had fought since then to gain the victory.

Pre-election polls revealed that 60 percent of Maine voters polled were in support of recognizing gay rights, but the anti-gay rights activists were better able to pool their supporters, most of whom were drawn from Maine's conservative religious core. Both groups plan to continue fighting on each of their platforms.

Trudging through Vietnam's mysteries

REFLECTION: Tangible artifact brings war home to child's imagination

Amy Turner

There are some artifacts that hang in the most unusual places, and throw shadows on the unlikeliest of innocents. There are words that are never uttered for fear of explanation and there are no explanations for a very elite conglomeration of events that permeated the '70s. There were no words offered to me, so at 10 years old I had woven my own images of Vietnam from the threads of documentaries on PBS, M.A.S.H. (even though it was set in Korea) on Channel 11 and scraps from my father. These things all helped to explain the war, but at 10 there was more room for contextualizing with a visual aid. My vehicle for understanding hung on a nail in the garage, dark and heavy.

It must have been 1986 when I noticed them. One afternoon, strangely void of one the WASP-y after-school activities designed for blossoming young ladies, I went out into the garage determined to find something new to play with. This cemetery for hobbies, fashion and tools held spiders, dust and mystery. On the left side, next to the never-used red Peugeot racing bike, a box of National Geographics, and a pair of cranberry New Balance running shoes, hung the objects of my fixation. Pendulous black leather combat boots swollen with valleys of creases. They looked too heavy to be suspended on a nail by the thin laces that had been knotted together at the ends. The first time I saw them I thought of Beetle Bailey cartoons and the punk rockers I'd seen in front of the high school. The next thing I thought was, "these things lived through Vietnam."

I sat down in a stupor about three feet away from them, avoiding the puddles of Volvo grease and the rest of my sanctioned little-kid universe. Spellbound by the evidence, I accidentally and immediately gave birth to a ritual that I kept up for years. To this day I don't know if it started because I was a sensitive kid with a vivid imagination or just a young dramatic determined to feel the tragedies of the world. Either way, there's no denying that these boots forced me to feel things. I would look at them for about an hour, starting off with images of gore, blown-up villages, grotesque injuries, clips I'd seen on documentaries and still photos from books secretly stationed on my father's night table. A 10-year-old's media montage of war. The next step was the audio. I would create the sounds the boots had made on different firmament. The slurping they would do in a swamp, the crushing and swishing through dry bush, the thud on the platform of a helicopter. I made a movie of my own, letting the images and the sounds merge into a fantastical ghastly opera. The first time I did it I remember getting up and gingerly turning one of them over, half expecting the sole to have clumps of dirt and blood and hair stuck to it, relieved at the tic-tac-toe of dried beige soil. It looked mundane, like the stuff in my backyard. I let go and tried to keep my distance, still wondering exactly where the soil was from.

The next part of my ceremony was the worst, because I let the tangible boots go, and I began to let leased but legitimate misery in. I began mourning for people I'd never met or harmed. I was allowed to be sad in my secret garage. I imagined all the families dissipated in the blasts, all the kids like me and my little brother, all the grandmas (and on and on and on until I imagined how it felt to lose everything I'd ever known). When the anxiety had nearly peaked, and I couldn't think of anything else one could lose, I would hit the crescendo and mourn the living – my soft-smiled father and all of the heavy Constituents lose when winner takes all

VOTING: Race panel must call into question, replace outdated electoral system

By Steven Hill

"This land is your land, this land is my land, from California to the New York islands."

President Clinton's panel on race relations has swept across the country and finally arrived in California. California is a most appropriate state for such a discussion, being home to a smorgasbord of 30 million Latinos, Asians, African Americans, whites, immigrants, Native Americans and everything in between. California has given us Propositions 187 and 209, two bitterly contested rollbacks of immigration rights and affirmative action – as well as the Rodney King riots and the O.J. trials.

How will so much diversity ever get along?

An important corollary to this question is this: how will all that diversity ever win fair representation in the legislatures? The two questions are related, because if voters don't feel represented, it's not likely they'll feel welcome either.

The irony of the type of democracy used in California and the rest of the United States is that the single representative elected to each district seat is supposed to represent everyone residing within that district. There persists this odd notion that an elected official "represents" you just because they occupy the district seat, even if you didn't vote for them and they are diametrically opposed to your point of view. Yet there are districts where a white Christian Republican lives next door to a Latino single mom Democrat who lives next door to a Korean small-businessman who lives next door to a duplex where a gay Reform Party computer programmer is rooming with a black Green environmentalist, etc., etc., ad infinitum.

Asking a single representative to straddle the ideological divide between so many perspectives is becoming increasingly impossible. The result is that millions of voters from different races and partisan perspectives have to compete against each other in a zero-sum game for representation – if I win representation, that means you don't win.

This dynamic exacerbates racial tensions in several ways. In most districts, minorities don't win representation because they need an unattainable plurality or majority to win. The U.S. Senate, which competes with Britain's House of Lords as the most un-representative body among Western democracies, has exactly one black and no Latino Senators.

Historically, we've tried to remedy such inequality by gerrymandering a certain number of districts so that a particular minority group is made into the majority. But this can have the effect of excluding other racial minorities within that district.

What's more, districts drawn for racial representation are becoming increasingly risky, as they have come under judicial fire with some racial districts being tossed out by the courts.

Also, the inability of single-seat districts to fairly represent diversity within the districts exacerbates tensions between urban and suburban areas.

Republicans have given up trying to win in most cities, which are racially-mixed and usually Democratic strongholds. Republicans tend to concentrate instead on the white suburbs. This polarization has far-reaching ramifications for cities since Republican legislatures have little to gain politically by supporting urban policy. Not surprisingly, a number of states are being sued over spending discrepancies in school funding between urban and suburban areas.

The national dialogue on race must move beyond conversation, identifying real-world institutional barriers that perpetuate and exacer-

HISTORY: Department head distorts facts after rejection of endowment

By Vachik Petrossian

The article published by Richard Von Glahn, chair of the department of history, in UCLA Today (Jan. 12) raises some important points to consider in accepting endowed chairs from foreign governments. One can only agree that "repugnance toward the human-rights record of the Turkish government and misgivings about accepting money from a foreign government that can control access to the object of study, in this case the archives of the defunct Ottoman Empire" might have motivated those faculty who turned down the chair. It is a fact that:

1. The government of Turkey has denied visas and access to the Ottoman archives to researchers who do not follow its official view of the past.

2. The government has recently forced Israel to withdraw the nomination of Professor Ehud Toledano as ambassador to Turkey because he once referred to the Armenian Genocide as a fact.

3. Turkey's government has actively engaged in influencing American academia for more than a decade and a half.

These are the reasons why 100 American writers and academics from the most prestigious institutions, including Nobel Prize winners, have condemned the academic practices of the Turkish government.

The Armenian Students' Association (ASA) is surprised by a number of Von Glahn's statements and the loaded language he uses to make them. The department and faculty members were "bombarded," he says, with "strongly-worded denunciations" of what opponents of the chair "regarded as the Turkish government's efforts to manipulate historical scholarship." This was, he adds, "a ferocious storm of protest." The ASA, on the other hand, believes that the American people do still have the right to write letters to a department and that UCLA students may visit the faculty during their office hours to express their concerns without having to face such innuendo.

Von Glahn presumes that public opinion was manipulated and that the student government should not have opposed the proposed chair without consulting with him. What is implied in such views is that the campus community and the student government were unable to form independent judgments based on rational arguments and substantial documentation, and that free, public debate is tantamount to manipulation, especially if the outcome of such debate goes against one's own views. In fact, the student government had done much investigation into the issue and had weighed the arguments before making its position known. Indeed, students concerned about human rights abuses, moral and ethical issues, and denial of genocide do have a right, not to say an obligation, to take a public stand.

We are also surprised that Von Glahn speaks of "reprehensible intimidation tactics (such as threats made to (him) and harassment of department staff)." A member of this student organization did go to see Von Glahn. The student prefaced his statement by making it clear that black history he had gained but could not hang in the garage.

That was 12 years ago, and I still don't understand everything about it (the war, the silence, my need to meditate on those damn boots). Maybe I was just a weird kid. But I can't help wondering if other kids had the feelings I had growing up. I never asked. It was not something discussed in my assigned circles of adults or peers. When I got a bit older, my father told me more about what he did, what he saw, what can never be understood by those who weren't there. Every year he would give additional increments of information and I would understand a little more. In his clearest recollections there is no jingoistic war-whoop of kick-ass gleaming in his eye, there is only the aching hollowness of a man robbed. Held at gunpoint by the comic-book heroes, society templates for masculinity, matinee idols, and political mish-mash that left us with the functioning silent wounded. In his clearest moments his eyes explain that he holds the atrocities close and will always have his vision obstructed by the vapors of innate mourning.

Now that I can discuss it. I'm not sure how much good it will do. The truth is, I still don't understand . I want to know how these men came home, got married, started families and careers after a tour or two. Then again, I suppose one doesn't have any other choice. I know of people who have fathers that served in Vietnam (but I don't know any of them who talk about). What happened in their homes? Was there a tacit avoidance concerning the subject of where Dad was in 1969? Did they discuss it without emotion, were their Dads were proud and preachy? Miserable? Both? Were they workaholics liable to snap or were they stoned? I wonder how other children imagined it – the war, that is ; I wonder if they asked, if they thought about it, if remains classified family information.

The boots still hang, floating in functional obsolescence in a Southern California garage. I haven't done my meditation in years simply because it is no longer an exercise in imagination because when he began to talk about it, the Technicolor tragedy I designed at 10 turned into a fluffy construction of one dimensional images. I didn't know war until I came face to face with it. You see, in the garage, I never put anyone in the boots. Now they are surrounded by a new pile of junk, some Buddy Holly records, a box of paper towels from the Price club, bottled water and a lawn chair. Still impossibly suspended, insouciant and hanging on the nail on the wall.

bate the racial divide. Certainly the continued use of single-seat "winner take all" districts is one such barrier. Fortunately, other options exist.

From 1870 to 1980, Illinois used cumulative voting in three-seat districts to elect its lower house. If 25 percent of voters supported only one candidate, that candidate was sure to win, giving minority voters a chance to win representation. This relatively minor modification of winner-take-all rules had a profound impact on Illinois politics. Nearly every district, even the Chicago districts, had two-party representation of both Republicans and Democrats, fostering bipartisan support for urban policy and giving voters more choice, better representation and creating more competition. In 1995 the Chicago Tribune editorialized, in support of cumulative voting's return, "Many partisans and political independents have looked back wistfully at the era of cumulative voting. They acknowledge that it produced some of the best and brightest in Illinois politics."

Even more effective would be to convert the U.S.-style "winner take all" voting system to a multi-seat proportional representation system.

South Africa is following this example in its post-apartheid era. In their first multiracial election, white and black ethnic minorities and the black majority won their fair share of seats without a single gerrymandered district. Moreover, the main parties reached out to voters of both races by running multiracial slates of candidates. Rather than polarize the nation along racial lines, the proportional election helped unify a fragile democracy.

President Clinton's panel on race relations ought to question seriously this reliance on "winner take all" single-seat districts. It's an antiquated 18th-century method that just isn't capable of serving the needs of a multi-racial, multi-partisan democracy, hurtling toward the 21st century.

Leaders as diverse as Clarence Thomas, Kevin Phillips, Eleanor Smeal and Congresswoman Cynthia McKinney have expressed an interest in exploring new approaches. It's long overdue, and now is the time.

PETROSSIAN

he had come not to bother the chair of the department but to share his concerns with him and to ask him a few questions. The student reminded Von Glahn that accepting the chair with conditions from a government with such a deplorable record of denialism, human rights violations and lack of academic freedom would damage the academic integrity of the university, and that if the chair were accepted, the issue would not fade away, for the community felt strongly about it. Von Glahn gave the unexpected response that he regarded this as a threat and added in an uncivil manner: "You don't give a shit about the integrity of the school."

Not only does the ASA condemn any threat and harassment tactics, but we call on Von Glahn to come forward and give proof of such actions. At a time when many complain about asserted student apathy with regard to social and civic matters, one would expect that the university as a whole, and department chairs in particular, would encourage students engaging in meaningful exchange of views with the faculty. We regret the chairperson's slanting of the facts in the wake of his department's rejection of the Turkish chair.

Super Smith to the rescue

By Vanessa VanderZander

Director Kevin Smith broadens his career and renews public interest in comic books by launching "Clerks. (The Comic Book)"

His leading man, Ben Affleck, awaits the Oscars to find out if he will win the prestigious Best Screenplay award for "Good Will Hunting." His leading lady, Joey Lauren Adams, leaves his crew to pursue other interests. So, not to be outdone, director/writer Kevin Smith will soon release a line of ... comic books?

"I just always wanted one day to get into writing comics," Smith explains. "Even before getting into film I was kind of leaning towards writing comics and this just seemed like the easiest way, to do something based on the stuff we've done."

The comic book series will be based on his debut film, "Clerks," which established Smith as a creative force to be reckoned with. His following films, "Mallrats" and "Chasing Amy," have continued to bring him success, though neither has yet appeared in comic book form. His "Clerks" comic hit stores Wednesday – both Smith and his artist Jim Mahfood will be signing the first issue at the Golden Apple Comic Book Mega-Store on Melrose Saturday from 2 p.m to 4p.m.

"This is the first time I've done a comic book signing," Smith admits. "I was at the San Diego comic con last year signing posters and books, like the screenplay book of 'Chasing Amy' and 'Clerks,' and the response was overwhelmingly positive. We were quite busy the whole time that we were there."

While the "Clerks" comic will hold most of Smith's attention at the moment, a 15-page Jay and Silent Bob comic will soon be released as well. The piece already appeared last month as part of an Oni Press anthology titled "The Oni Double Feature," though it has yet to become the mini-series connecting the end of "Chasing Amy" to the characters' arrival on the set of Smith's film in progress, "Dogma," which Smith has envisioned. Meanwhile, Smith has no hesitations about attending comic book conventions in support of his work.

"The big joke about comic book fans is that you'll go to a comic book show with a friend and kind of look down your nose at everybody and feel like, 'Look at those fucking geeks,'" Smith admits. "And across the way, the geeks you're looking at are looking at you, going, 'Look at those fucking geeks.' Nobody wants to own up to being what

'Fault' motions are now an art form

DANCE: Movements of earth, dancers brought together to flow as one

By Jammie Salagubang
Daily Bruin Contributor

There's a whole lot of shaking going on – both metaphorically and physically – in "Fault," the new work by the Margaret Jenkins Dance Company which shows at the Wiltern Theater Friday and Saturday.

"'Fault' resonates not only geologically, but politically and historically as well," says Margaret Jenkins, the director and founder of the company. "I was interested in making a work in collaboration with my company and other associates that would investigate the different ways in which that metaphor resonates under the ground and above the ground."

> "Artists (must) be aware of the social and historical fault lines we all have to negotiate."
> Margaret Jenkins
> Margaret Jenkins Dance Company founder

Jenkins was first hit by the idea when a repertory dance company in Salt Lake City commissioned her to do a work about the Great Basin. She did extensive research and discovered the themes that would shape her work.

"Looking into the nature of the land felt very poignant because I think there are so many things about how the land forms and disrupts and splits and displaces and ruptures and resists that are of course parallel to the nature of the human being," Jenkins comments. "I think that it is critical that artists be aware of the social and historical fault lines that we all have to negotiate."

She describes the first half of the piece as having a dense texture, a sort of "underground" feel, very rich and colored with activity. The second half seems sparse and quiet in comparison.

"The first half is like looking at the exterior of the landscape, at lots of rocks. The second half is then breaking that rock open and looking inside," Jenkins says.

Helping her convey the seismic metaphors are myriad people. Dancers, musicians, composers and a poet worked together on "Fault."

"It's a natural part of how she makes her work, to collaborate intensively with all the media required to make a dance," says Paul Dresher, whose ensemble performs the live music for "Fault" at the UCLA and Chicago performances: "The process that you use to collaborate, the nature of how you define how decisions are made really determine a great deal about the work itself."

David Lang is one of the two composers of the score for "Fault" and wrote the music for the Paul Dresher Ensemble. Lang's work is primarily

China, U.S. open dialogue about movies

FILM: Goal is to deepen understanding, develop relationship between countries

By Louise Chu
Daily Bruin Contributor

There's more to Chinese cinema than a wealth of Jackie Chan movies and John Woo films.

Unfortunately, the majority of the American public is not privy to such Chinese national treasures as "Ju Do," "The Lin Family Shop" and "Red River Valley," which is what prompted the Celebration of Chinese Cinema, a three-day film festival that began Friday at UCLA and included a seminar on "Filmmaking in the U.S. and China: Divergence and Convergence," on Saturday in the James Bridges Theater.

The film festival was a unique opportunity to see the directions Chinese film has taken in the past decade, a time when China's film industry grew significantly. Of the 10 films that were shown, many are rare or are not available in the United States.

As an attempt to deepen mutual understanding and develop relationships with their American counterparts for future entertainment ventures, a 10-person delegation of Chinese film industry leaders, including Zhao Shi (vice minister of film, television and radio), Han San Ping (president of the Beijing Film Studio) and internationally acclaimed director Zhang Yimou ("Raise the Red Lantern" and "Ju Do") met with American film scholars and professionals.

Some of those on hand for a panel discussion about the artistic, economic, political and social aspects of film included Michael Medavoy (chairman and chief executive officer of Phoenix Studios) and Steve Stabler (co-president of the Motion Picture Corporation of America).

"The central question is, of course, the debate between art and politics and censorship," said UCLA Professor Joshua Muldavin, co-chair of international development studies and the panel's moderator.

Muldavin began the discussion with a focus on the issue of film censorship by governments, ratings systems, the audiences and religious organizations.

Medavoy continued by giving a general background on the American film industry "from which discussion is possible." He explained the importance of American motion picture companies and the large role that investors must play in the making of a film.

"To give you an idea of the value of one of these companies, the last conglomerate that was sold was Paramount Pictures, which was sold for about $11.5 billion," Medavoy said. "It takes a billion plus dollars to operate one of these companies ... Three hundred-fifty to 400 films are released a year by the major companies. This is, in some way, why art must co-exist with commerce."

Then it was China's turn. Speaking through an interpreter, as did the other members of the Chinese delegation, Zhao offered some background on the Chinese film industry.

"The Chinese film industry has a history of over 90 years. It is developing tremendously, especially since the founding of the People's Republic of China in 1949, especially since

Filmmaker Julie Davis does exactly what she has to do

FILM: Director feels few works explore sex lives of heterosexual women

By Louise Chu
Daily Bruin Contributor

Standing in a freezing cold phone booth in the middle of Sequoia National Park at night, Julie Davis was getting something done. It wasn't necessarily easy for her, but her commitment to doing an interview with The Bruin was something that she intended to honor. The weakened phone lines from her room made this the only available alternative. She did what she had to do. And she always has.

After an unusual film career working as an extra on movie sets, editing low-budget Korean action movies and working for the Playboy Channel, Davis realized her dream in the form of "I Love You ... Don't Touch Me!" a movie that the 28-year-old wrote, produced, directed and edited.

The film is a comedy about Katie (Marla Schaffel), a 25-year-old virgin and hopeless romantic in search of Mr. Perfect in the Los Angeles singles scene.

Before she could actually get the movie made, she ran into considerable financial difficulty. She invested her life savings into the project and even sold her grandmother's antique diamond ring, which she ultimately felt was the right decision.

"To me, it was just something hidden away in a safe-deposit box," Davis explains. "The movie was something I could share with the world, and the ring was something that would just be on my finger, and there was no comparison."

With a meager budget of $40,000, Davis was forced to spend the money conservatively, opting to shoot many of the scenes in both her and her friends' apartments.

Ironically, of her many jobs preceding the making of "I Love You ... Don't Touch Me!" her stint as an editor for the Playboy Channel seemed to directly have the greatest effect on her in making the movie.

"I think (that Playboy influenced my perspective on love and sex) a lot because it really helped me get into the male psyche. And I think it really helped me write men as realistic characters," Davis says.

Yet she is quick to admit that working at Playboy was initially an unsettling experience.

"Oh, it was pretty shocking working at a place like that," Davis confesses. "In the beginning, I felt like the little girl lost in the wilderness. It was a very scary place to be working, but the people were great, and it actually ended up inspiring me to write the script because every day I was being challenged about what I believed in and what I thought about sex.

"So it was a good place to be," Davis continues. "I think anything that challenges you psychologically – what you think about life, your beliefs, things that are important to you – is a good thing."

In the movie itself, Davis found a place to directly apply the insight she had acquired from her Playboy experience.

"I would say that I applied it more in the female perspective of just being really confused and enraged by the causal attitude that men have toward sex," Davis explains. "And in the male character, especially in the character of Jones – he's a direct voice of someone I had worked with at Playboy."

The story, which she reveals is "loosely autobiographical," concerns a topic that Davis felt needed to be addressed.

'Beauty' uses past to illuminate present

FILM: Director explores 16th-century 'whores,' paradox of modern day

By Lonnie Harris
Daily Bruin Contributor

It follows the traditions of "Pretty Woman" and "Leaving Las Vegas." But these dangerous beauties live in Renaissance Venice.

"Dangerous Beauty," which opens tomorrow, unfolds its tale of courtly prostitutes as a morality play for modern audiences rather than a fable or a period piece. At least, that's what the director and the cast hope the audience gets out the story.

The film, based on a non-fiction book called "The Honest Courtesan," retells the adventures of Veronica Franco (Catherine McCormack), a lower-class girl who cannot marry her true love (Rufus Sewell) and therefore becomes a courtesan (a delightfully innocent 16th-century word for "whore").

We learn early on in the film that courtesans are the most educated, intelligent women in all of Venice because, unlike wives, they have no responsibility to any husbands or children. Whereas most of the women in the city are oppressed by their men, the courtesans are free to do as they choose. The whole story plays almost as a negative of modern society, where upwardly mobile women are perceived as having more freedom and education than any hooker on the streets.

This paradox is exactly what director Marshall Herskovitz wanted to convey. Herskovitz, best known for producing television's "Thirtysomething," and "My So-Called Life," tried to use Franco's story, however antiquated it may be, to say something to modern women about the roles they play in society.

> The real message of the movie is that women cannot be treated as sexual objects.

"This particular period piece gave us a wonderful opportunity to look at certain ironies of how we live today," Herskovitz says. "Here's a world in this film in which if you are a regular woman, you aren't allowed to read, you have a marriage arranged by your parents, your husband cares nothing for you, you're basically a breeding sheep and you die young. If you're a prostitute, you're educated, you're expected to be an artist of some kind, you are free to own your own home and free to have love."

The film attacks the notion that women can be placed into certain roles automatically. Franco fights against such pigeon-holing by showing off her wit and poetic abilities openly, as well as familiarizing herself with much of the literature and art of the time. She becomes, as one character refers to her, "a national asset." It is this freedom to be both a sexual being and a learned, productive person that Herskovitz hopes all women can one day achieve.

"The movie's trying to say that it's time to allow people to be integrated as one self, which includes sexuality," Herskovitz explains.

For obvious reasons, the film delves very deeply into the issue of sexuality, and how much of a woman's overall nature is made up of her physical appearance and her sensuousness.

For Herskovitz and the other creators of "Dangerous Beauty," the real message of the movie is that women cannot be treated as sexual objects, but are beings for whom sexuality is one small portion of their overall personality. He finds hope that these views are coming to fruition in the younger generation.

"There has begun to be a voice, especially among younger women, that 'I don't want to be seen that way any more,'" Herskovitz says. "'I don't want people to judge me by my sexual partners, or my number of sexual partners, or what I wear to work. It's my damn business.'"

The focus on sexuality is also a concern for actress Catherine

Mozart's 'Magic Flute' returns with fantastic, whimsical style

MUSIC: New director, format makes classic more colorful, exciting

By Reed Johnson
Los Angeles Daily News

An overgrown schoolboy. An oversexed genius.

Ever since Peter Shaffer's play "Amadeus" and Milos Forman's subsequent movie version, that's been the popular, if widely debated, image of Mozart.

Yet as the L.A. Opera's current revival of "The Magic Flute" reminds us, it takes a very mature artist to see the world like a hyperimaginative adolescent. Set halfway between lush children's fable and pre-Enlightenment allegory, "The Magic Flute" exists in a state of magically arrested development – ever anxious, ever hopeful and forever promising that whatever's around the corner will be better than what we have now.

Originally directed by Sir Peter Hall, with sets and costumes by British illustrator Gerald Scarfe, this production stirred international interest when it premiered at the Dorothy Chandler Pavilion in 1993. In its present state, directed by Paul L. King, the production's most salient feature remains Scarfe's brilliantly conceived design schemes.

Best-known as a savage political satirist, Scarfe makes the most of the Dorothy Chandler's massive canvas, filling it with richly saturated Froot Loops colors, psychedelic rear-screen projections and a bestiary of whimsical creatures such as a half-baboon, half-tiger and a tottering penguin with a crocodile's head. Scarfe turns Mozart's ancient Egypt into a pop-operatic fusion of Sesame Street and Haight-Ashbury circa 1967 – a realm simultaneously fantastic and vaguely frightening. This playfully menacing sensibility permeates the production. Mozart's heroes were lovers, not fighters, and the sweet-sung Fedderly (impressive in last fall's "La Boheme") is cut from the proper cloth. He's pure, if not overpowering.

Israel Museum gives tiny country big chance to shine

ART: Nation uses foreign donations to fill gallery with renowned works

By Christine Temin
The Boston Globe

Like Israel itself, the Israel Museum depends on foreign aid. And that aid can be staggering in scale. The $42 million that New York businessman Martin Gruss gave the museum two months ago is thought to be the largest cash gift a single donor has ever made to an art museum.

Like Israel itself, the Israel Museum suffers mightily when, because of bombings, foreigners are scared away. Attendance at the museum can plummet from the million visitors of a good year to little more than half that number.

And, like Israel itself, the Israel Museum is a politically sensitive place. Consider the reaction to artist Roee Rosen's recent installation, "Live and Die as Eva Braun: Hitler's Mistress, in the Berlin Bunker and Beyond."

"It's been horribly controversial," Israel Museum director James Snyder says. A year into his tenure as director, the Harvard-educated Snyder, the first American to head Israel's national art museum, found himself embroiled in an art-and-politics crisis á la Mapplethorpe. At a museum virtually in the shadow of Yad Vashem, the Holocaust memorial that is also one of the world's most monumental and moving ensembles of art and architecture, a show about Hitler hits raw nerves.

"The mere fact of Eva Braun's name in the title is something some people couldn't get around," Snyder says. He gave them a chance to vent their feelings (venting, especially on politicized topics, is a favorite Israeli pastime) in a comment book. Lots of museums offer such books, and mostly the comments run to "Nice show." At the Eva Braun exhibition, you could see people patiently filling page after page with their thoughts, both pro and con.

One Israeli who didn't bother to do so was the Jerusalem deputy mayor, who summarily demanded the removal of the Eva Braun show, a text-and-drawings fantasy that strays far from historical fact. "He hadn't seen it, of course, but he accused the exhibition of depicting Hitler in a positive light," says Snyder. It did nothing of the sort. But neither was it a straight Nazis-as-monsters presentation. It was subtler and more imaginative, and that's what got it into trouble. Ultimately, the deputy was overruled by the mayor, and the show, which closed Jan. 3, stayed up for its full run.

"My only real concern was that there was a hint of pornography in it," Snyder adds, glancing at the show's catalog of drawings that are a cross between cut-paper silhouettes and Rorschach tests, with plenty of phallic and vaginal imagery. "Nobody said boo about that," he marvels.

> "People said, 'We need guns and food. Teddy Kollek said, 'We need art.'"
> James Snyder
> Israel Museum director

The state of Israel is 50 this year; the Israel Museum is 33. That the nation had a museum so soon after its birth was due to Teddy Kollek, the legendary former mayor of Jerusalem who was also the founder of the museum and still, at age 86, maintains an office next to Snyder's own.

Snyder speaks of him in folk-hero terms. "People said, 'We need guns and food.' Teddy Kollek said 'We need art.'" And Kollek thought that the nation needed art in the most prominent place possible. He saw to it that the museum was situated atop one of a trio of hills in western Jerusalem. On the others are the Supreme Court and the Knesset, Israel's parliament. The message that art is as important as justice and law rings clear.

The museum's architects, Alfred Mansfield and Dora Gad, designed a series of stone pavilions that sprawl over the land, like a traditional Arab village. The ground-hugging buildings are inviting, and inevitably invite comparison with the fortress-like compound of that other museum atop a hill, the new Getty Center in Los Angeles. The Israel Museum is as welcoming as the Getty is aloof.

In many ways the Israel Museum is like any big encyclopedic museum with a responsibility to offer its audiences a soup-to-nuts presentation of world art, similar, say, to Boston's Museum of Fine Arts (MFA). In other ways it's not. Most important, while support for a museum like the MFA is largely local, the Israel Museum's support comes from collectors and philanthropists the world over.

Because the museum has no acquisitions funding to speak of, it relies on gifts of art as well as money. Ninety-five percent of the museum's collections have been donated, mostly by collectors in the United States and Europe. Last week, the museum announced that it received one of the most comprehensive collections of Dada and Surrealist art in the world from Arturo Schwarz of Italy. Including more than 700 paintings, drawings, collages, sculptures and other objects, Snyder says that "this new gift positions the museum as the most important center world-wide for exploring the emergence, flowering and continuing influence of these movements."

After the 1996 death of New York investment banker John Loeb, most of his collection was sold at auction. An exception was a major Pissarro, "Boulevard Montmartre: Spring, 1897," which went to the Israel Museum. Among those who have given entire collections is Hollywood producer Sam Spiegel, a 1941 refugee from Hitler's Europe. The Spiegel gift includes important works by the likes of Cezanne, Degas and Gauguin.

At a time when so much attention is focused on the fate of art looted by Nazis, art that in some cases remains on the walls of well-known museums or auction houses rather than in rightful hands, it's heartening to see that important works have wound up in everyone else is, and I don't know, I kind of dig on it."

> "(The comic book industry has) gotten a hell of a lot more interesting,"
> Kevin Smith
> Director/comic book author

Proclaiming to have enjoyed comics since an early age, only stopping the obsession in high school because he was "too cool or something," Smith appreciates the opportunity to be a part of the process. Though he realizes that many readers may pick up his work only because of his connection with the film industry, he feels the connection won't negate his creative ability. However, it most probably will lead to a small amount of film fans becoming exposed to the world of the failing comics industry through Smith's efforts.

"In the time I stopped reading comic books to the time I picked them up again, it's gotten a hell of a lot more interesting," Smith says of the comics world. "Writing just became so much better, so much tighter, so much more literary and adult oriented, that's the plus. The drawback is that comics aren't for kids anymore."

With this realization, the industry has been hurting. No longer do people like Smith, who grew up on comic books, switch over to the new lines of adult works with age. Instead, kids reach for the joystick of their favorite video games, never thinking to check out a comic book store once they grow into adulthood.

"Video games seem to be more interactive because you're controlling everything, but with reading comics it's like reading books. It's more about using your imagination, even though with comics it's kind of laid out there for you," Smith claims. "But comics kind of play with a different side of your brain than video games do."

> "Comics kind of play with a different side of your brain than video games do."
> Kevin Smith

However, Smith doesn't profess to change the world of comics with his new line. He plans to keep his work on the adult level that his films have attained. However, he does admit that nowadays, "your average six-year-old pretty much knows what 'fuck' means."

"Growing up with comics, I think it instills a kind of basic moral barometer between right and wrong," Smith speculates. "It sounds hokey to say, but you learn in life there are good guys and bad guys, and you want to be at least a decent guy. I mean, that's why I think comics got a lot more interesting in the last 10 years, because even the good guys are at fault, and it's easier to relate to them. It's not just guys in tights beating the shit out of each other anymore."

Though he feels the book he's writing is "a far cry from the books I usually read," such as Vertigo/DC titles, he thinks the humor involved will prove it worthy of a good perusal.

Likewise, though his forthcoming film, "Dogma," will stray from his usual flicks in its ambitiousness, it will maintain Smith's dialogue-heavy flair for laughs. Starring Ben Affleck, Matt Damon, Linda Fiorentino, Chris Rock, Selma Hayek and Alan Richtman, it will also surprisingly maintain his low budget style.

"Everyone's pretty much doing it for reduced, reduced rates," Smith admits. "You don't want to get to a place where you're forcing your friends into cheap labor all the time, but I think it depends on the project. What the budget is, if you're inclined to doing it and they have the time."

> "(In comics today)even the good guys are at fault, and it's easier to relate to them."
> Kevin Smith

And even though Joey Lauren Adams, his ex-girlfriend and the star of "Chasing Amy" pulled out of the project at the last minute, production is still scheduled to take place in March. Ideally, the writer/director/comic book author would enjoy living his creative parallel for as long as possible. Which just may be possible if he maintains his laid back attitude.

"I don't know," Smith relates,"I can't solve the social ills, man, I just want to tell some funny stories."

COMIC: Kevin Smith and artist Jim Mahfood will be signing the first issue of their new comic book series at the Golden Apple Comic Book Mega-Store on Melrose Saturday from 2 p.m. to 4 p.m.

FLUTE

Same goes for soprano Gwendolyn Bradley's Pamina, an innocent but determined vocal presence amid Mozart's exotic tonalities.

The remaining cast offers generally solid support, though it's a shame to have versatile baritone Kurt Ollmann underutilized here as the Speaker. Making his long-overdue North American operatic stage debut as Papageno the bird-catcher, Austrian lyric baritone Wolfgang Holzmair steals the production with his euphoric and self-mocking phrasings. And Sally Wolf carries off the Queen of the Night's tongue-twisting lyrics with aplomb.

Oddly, at Friday's opening-night performance, nearly everyone sounded a bit muted in Act 1, as if that giant pyramid at center stage were a black hole sucking up noise. Even Kenneth Cox's commanding Sarastro seemed distant.

By contrast, the orchestra was gently commanding. Under Sir Peter's original direction, Mozart's music has received a large injection of British comic-operatic irreverence, a Gilbert and Sullivan tongue-in-cheek that permits absurdity without silliness. Conductor Julius Rudel, however, keeps these 19th-century impulses in check, ensuring that an opera that was ahead of its time stays true to the spirit of its own age.

HOW THE PLANETS WORK
Saturday, February 21, 1998; 9am - 5pm, doors open at 8:15; No registration; Fowler Museum, Lenart Auditorium.
Presented by the UCLA Center for the Physics & Chemistry of the Planets, a research and education unit of the Institute for Geophysics and Planetary Physics.
This one day non-specialist talk is given by a group of world class research scientists who will present and discuss the most up to date knwoledge and understanding we now have about planets and planetary systems. From the inner processes that result in surface earthquakes and mountain building process, to the outer processes that result in Ice Ages and meteorite impacts. Exciting results from the recent Mars-Pathfinder Mission will also be presented.
This series is designed for the general public, public officials, high school and college students, teachers and UCLA Faculty, staff and students of all disciplines.

CHINA

the economic reform, which started 20 years ago," Zhao explained.

She continued to discuss the significant growth and success of Chinese film but admitted that there is still much to learn from technologically sophisticated countries, such as the United States.

"Although a brief achievement and progress has been made in the film industry in the past decade, we are still facing some problems. So Chinese film professionals try to produce films with the highest level of artistic value with low cost," Zhao said. "As far as the technical is concerned, we are trying to learn from the advances of technology of the world. We are now adopting digital audio-visual techniques, but we still have a long way to go to catch up with (other) countries."

One of Zhao's main concerns was the relative imbalance in the cultural exchange between the United States and China. She pointed out that while the Chinese seemed to embrace American films, Chinese filmmakers were having a harder time penetrating the American market. This sparked an extensive discussion and analysis of how Chinese films are and could be received by the American audience.

Stabler agreed with Zhao and offered a possible solution.

"This is the universal problem that a filmmaker faces, whether it's art vs. politics in China, or art vs. commerce in the United States," Stabler said. "The issue is how American film can be seen in China, and how Chinese films can be seen in the United States – Just to make movies that would appeal to the commonality between the two countries."

Medavoy added: "Things that are fresh, that are different, that speak to a person's everyday life in a manner that people are accustomed to, that have an honesty and integrity to its subjects are often the kind of films that Americans seem to like."

He cited "Good Will Hunting" as an example. He reasoned that the film, written by two relatively unknown young actors (Matt Damon and Ben Affleck), has achieved tremendous success because it "has a kind of integrity and honesty that's something of a slice of life."

Robert Rosen, chair of the UCLA School of Theater, Film, and Television, examined the appeal of certain Chinese films over others and found an explanation in two paradoxes.

"The first is defined broader international acceptance ... Very often the mistake and impression is that because American films sell so well, you should make movies that look like American films – that's a bad policy," Rosen said. "(There should be) a dialogue with the aesthetics of other film artists but ultimately rooted in your own tradition that makes something distinctive that can find the niche market in an American setting that will attract audiences."

Rosen stated that the second paradox was that many films that had been successful had dealt with "universal" issues, and "hence accessible to world audiences."

Zhang confirmed this assertion when explaining why he feels his films have seen international success.

"I respect my own integrity," the Academy Awards nominated director said. "I respect the Chinese people's feelings – I just try to play out their lives. I think one of the reasons my films get a response internationally would be my concern about people. It's a basic kind of humanitarian concern."

And when the panel opened to questions from the audience, it was Zhang who was the center of attention, prompting questions about his background and personal taste in film. Apparently, his cinematic message has come through clearly.

DAVIS

"I think virginity is a really important topic that's totally neglected that's a really big deal for women, especially in the college years," Davis says. "I think women in the '90s especially relate to it because we have so much freedom to do whatever we want that if you don't take that sexual freedom, then people think there's something wrong with you; like we have the freedom to say 'yes,' but we don't have the freedom to say 'no' anymore."

With the recent successes of movies like "Swingers" and "The Brothers McMullen," which examine the romantic lives of young American men, Davis felt that film audiences were lacking the young female perspective. She also asserts that the only female group with a voice was lesbians, who traditionally supported one another more than in the straight community.

"It's almost like we don't have a voice at all," Davis says. "You see Ed Burns (and) Spike Lee, and they had their voice. Where is the young woman? Why is it that they have something to say and we don't? And if we do, it's a chick flick, or it's made by a lesbian. Women don't seem to get the chances or have the voice until they're in their 40s."

With this movie, Davis has succeeded in addressing those concerns and, in that, has realized her dreams as a filmmaker.

"I Love You" earned wide acclaim at the Sundance Film Festival, where Samuel Goldwyn Company, a division of MGM/UA, picked it up for distribution.

The attention she has generated sparked the interest of others, several of whom are now working with her on two other screenplays. Davis, alongside Mitchell Whitfield, one of the stars of "I Love You," has also just sold the pilot to a television series based on the film, which they hope will "be the new Seinfeld."

Davis did what she had to do ... and it paid off. She acknowledges the value of determination and sacrifice and encourages others to do the same.

"I think that right now is when you have to start putting it all together," Davis says. "And don't think that you can't do whatever it is that you want. It's always going to be hard, but you can do it."

FILM: "I Love You ... Don't Touch Me!" opens tomorrow.

DANGEROUS

McCormack, who portrays Franco as beautiful but also strikingly intelligent.

"Being in this business and working in Hollywood is very much about the way you look," McCormack admits.

As well, McCormack took to the script in large part because she understood the character and felt for her plight. As a woman, McCormack realizes how few opportunities were available to females living in the Renaissance, or any other period in history.

In addition to sympathizing with the Venetian girls' lack of options for their future well-being, McCormack can now sympathize with the fashions that were thrust upon these women as well. She had to perform most of her scenes in tight-fitting corsets and uncomfortable shoes.

"The restriction of those dresses, after three months, really got to me," McCormack says. "They're very beautiful, but the restrictiveness of wearing them every day is a very vivid memory."

FILM: "Dangerous Beauty" opens Friday.

JENKINS

instrumental while the other composer, Alvin Curran, focuses on the ordinary sounds of life, like wood breaking or billiard balls colliding.

"There's two different composers so there's a question of how the music from my world is rubbing up against his world," Lang says. "I think what (Jenkins) was trying to do was get people with different backgrounds who would each bring something different and then you would get a little friction, a fault line, from that too."

> "The two different speeds the information came to you ... would allow the music to regain its integrity."
> David Lang
> Composer

Lang describes his work at times propulsive, even maniacal, while still providing a counterbalance to the dance. For example, while the dancers perform with tremendous activity onstage, the music moves along at a slower pace.

"I felt that the tensions between the two different speeds the information came to you, both visually and through what you hear, would allow the music to retain its integrity and make a comment on what was happening onstage, but not dominate it or get in its way," Lang comments. "The way I interpreted my role in this was to be an intelligent listener."

Jenkins' dancers played not only important physical roles, but choreographic roles as well. Hired on a project-by-project basis, the nine dancers designed all the moves. Many of them trained in distinctly different dance backgrounds, contributing to the fault notion as well.

> "The dance vocabulary, the movement that you'll see in 'Fault,' was originally made by the dancers."
> Margaret Jenkins
> Margaret Jenkins Dance Company founder

"The dance vocabulary, the movement that you'll see in 'Fault,' (was) originally made by the dancers in the company and edited and directed by me," Jenkins says. "They are dancers who come from all different kinds of dancing, so the piece reflects that as well."

Jenkins says "Fault" is not a linear story. She and her colleagues were more interested in providing an environment on stage that allowed the audience to make up its own story.

"It's not really necessary to see all of these oppositions and frictions resolved or to come to an explosion or climax," Lang explains. "All that's necessary is to have the feeling that there's this internal life of struggle."

DANCE: "Fault" will be performed Friday and Saturday at the Veterans Wadsworth Theater at 8 p.m. Tickets are $30, $27 and $9 with UCLA student I.D. For more information, call (310) 825-2101.

How to Write an Effective Ad
- Start your ad with the merchandise you are selling. This makes it easier for readers to quickly scan the ads and locate your items.
- Always include the price of your item. Many classified readers simply do not respond to ads without prices.
- Avoid abbreviations—make you ad easy for readers to understand.
- Place yourself in the reader's position, ask what you would like to know about the merchandise, and include that in the ad. Include such information as brand names, colors and other specific descriptions.

PROJECT PIPELINE
PROVIDING CALIFORNIA TEACHERS

580 University Ave., Suite 203 • Sacramento, CA 95825

Oh what a night. Sure, you pretty much already had your fill when everybody sat down for a quick round of quarters. Of course you didn't want to be the odd one out. Don't want to disappoint the gang now do you? Yeah, it was a great party. Great fun! Actually twice the fun, once you started seeing double! But here it is, the morning after, and you catch a real eyeful in the mirror. Good morning! Surprise! You can't hide those Social Eyes! Or is that blood-shot eyes? Along with Mr. Sunshine accosting those big baby blues came a Ska drummer in your head, a roller coaster in your stomach, and a wonderful poo poo taste in your mouth.

[Student Health Education. Here's mud in your eye.]

So you got a little pie-eyed. Aye Caramba! Now if you could only remember where you left your sun glasses. Alas, some folks never learn. And here's the real eye opener: Most UCLA students drink 4 or less when they party. Some don't drink at all. Some are vegetarians. Some like disco. Some think that these Public Service Announcements are nothing more than an eyesore. (If you're one of those who think that, I've got two words for you and they aren't "Go Bruins.") Anyway, if you're having a problem seeing things eye to eye, and your bed seems to be in the eye of a tornado, keep an eye out for yourself and remember when you've done 4, you're done. Aye, Aye, Capt'n.

lective confidence in our team is damaged since they didn't just come up short of the gold, but they tripped on their proverbial skate laces on the way to the medal stand and fell flat on their faces, out of the medals.

So, it may look grim for our gap-toothed squad, but let's try and remember the good things.

Who can forget that heartstopping victory over Belarus (population 19) in the round robin competition?

How will anyone ever lose that indelible image of our sturdy front line of John LeClair and Brett Hull trying really, really hard to score goals?

On the flip side, what did the women really accomplish anyway? (Before we discuss this, let's agree not to consider the fact that they won the first women's hockey gold medal, beating Team Canada twice in the process.)

Sure, they've become the media darlings of the games, shown that women's hockey is really fun and exciting to watch and lived up to every expectation that a nation could put on them.

> Each team would be acting just like the other did when the games began.

But, hey, what have you done for me lately?

The men would come into the game with something to prove, and the women would be overconfident, cocky, and ill-prepared. In essence, each team would be acting just like the other did when the games began, thus each would suffer a similar fate.

There is only one thing that we would have to be very careful of – that would be keeping the trash-talking to a minimum, because some of the men's feelings might get hurt.

I only have the best interests of the testosterone-based life forms in mind, because the estrogen variety showed that absolutely nothing is sacred or off-limits to their witticisms when an unidentified U.S. player insulted a Canadian player's deceased father during the two teams' initial meeting.

Could you imagine Chris Chelios captaining the American men into this game and losing his cool when Cammi Granato insulted his poor dental work, then whupped him upside the head with her stick?

Hey, I would pay to see that happen.

FEATURE

have stepped up, blazing through opponents' bats, collecting an ERA under one.

The oldest pitcher is a transfer student, Erin Weiler, who has a 3-0 record. Trying to fill the shoes of a pitching staff last year that won 49 games, had 1.60 ERA, and compiled 403 strikeouts, and are all no longer on the team has been hard.

"It has been great because there has been no special expectations put on us but last year's (pitchers) are always at the back of our minds," Weiler said.

Helping to relieve the pressure off of Weiler has been one of the biggest surprises in the camp, Stephanie Swenson. Swenson is a true freshman from San Clemente who was not even recruited by UCLA and signed late with the Bruins. Swenson is on an amazing tear, racking up 11 strikeouts and three wins.

"We used to have a lot of stoppers who would come in and throw heat but now we don't have that ... Gayer and Swenson are our hardest throwers," Inouye-Perez said. "Swenson has been our biggest surprise because coming out of high school we didn't know what she was about but she has stepped up and been real effective."

With new pitchers, strong defense is a must in order for the Bruins to win. At third base, Jenny Gardner has impressed, gobbling up every thing hit her way.

"It has been a dream since I was playing softball at the age of six to come in and play at UCLA," Gardner, who is batting respectably at .263, said.

Her dream has come true as she has become one of the consistent new performers to the team.

Filling in last year's shoes the rookies have come out playing with a lot of confidence and that has helped them lead by example.

"I didn't expect confidence in a lot of the new girls," Laurie Fritz, senior lead-off hitter, said. "But they have shown confidence and confidence is everything in this game."

One player with a basepath full of confidence is left fielder Casey Hirawiwa, who has jumped all over opposing pitchers for a .308 batting average. Playing stellar defense, Hirawiwa is the ultimate example of a Bruin.

"Hirawiwa swings a good stick ... She is a little thing but hits the ball hard consistently," Inouye-Perez said. "She has a terrific gameface, and plays solid defense even though she is an infielder converted to the outfield."

The new players have enough confidence in their game to help lead the way for a great Bruin team. Through the sharing of the leadership role, the team has meshed and has relieved the pressure of coming into UCLA and having to make an impact.

"Geese fly in a V shape and the head goose absorbs 72 percent of the wind. When the goose gets tired it goes to the back of the formation," Gayer, who has one victory under her belt, said about sharing the leadership.

"When the head goose goes to the back a new goose steps up and it is a continuous action to keep the head geese from wearing out."

The leadership is transferred from game to game, from outspoken inspirational leaders to extreme Laurie Fritz hustle. This has eased the tension this year and has made the softball diamond fun again for the Bruins.

With a lot of heart and great team chemistry the team has put behind it the armageddon created by last year's fiasco.

The returners and rookies have come together to surprise the softball world.

The Bruins may have to hibernate from postseason this year but with such a talented squad earning experience this year, the Bruins will be ready to party "like it's 1999."

PROBATION

Series," Laurie Fritz, second basemen, said, "and they told us 'you guys cant go' ... we were working four to five hours a day then doing weights ... It didn't seem fair."

Immediately, the high rays of happiness on Easton were dampened by the stormy truth. Heading into their final games against Arizona State before the seedings, UCLA said they wouldn't appeal. But they did.

The appeal allowed UCLA to be seeded and the NCAA granted the Bruins the chance to play in the post season but it would cost them this year.

"The probation was not the issue it was the post season," assistant coach Kelly Inouye-Perez said. "It was disappointing because it affected the seniors last year ... Now it affects the current seniors who just want to play and finish up strong."

Not only are the Bruins on probation, but many outstanding players have red-shirted or transferred. The biggest loss to the club may have been freshman phenom, Christa Williams, who blew away opponents on the pitching mound. Williams transferred to the University of Texas, taking with her a 21-8 record and 218 strikeouts.

Another integral part of the Bruin pitching staff who was affected by the probation is Courtney Dale, who is redshirting this year. Dale was 7-1 in 17 appearances, but more importantly batted .330, giving the Bruins an instant spark in the line-up. Redshirting with Dale are National Team members Julie Adams, Christie Ambrosi and Stacey Nuveman.

The probation depleted the team of perennial all-stars and an unstoppable pitching staff. With a crop of freshmen and transfers, the four seniors will have to step up and melt away all those shadows away that are haunting Easton.

down by four with 1:12 remaining after Trojan guard Kevin Augustine hit a three-pointer from the right side. Bailey would connect on two free throws with 1:04 left in regulation.

Then it was the Bruin defense's turn. Augustine drove into the lane, but J.R. Henderson deflected the shot. UCLA's Earl Watson would come up with the ball and missed his ensuing shot attempt, but Bailey was there for the putback that would send the game into overtime.

"(Taking charge) is something that automatically comes, it's nothing I really think about," said Bailey, who scored 17 points. "I think I needed a game like this, especially since against Stanford I was doing the same thing and I fell a little short when I slipped. It felt like I just let the team down a little bit and to come back and get a win like this, I think it does a lot for the team."

Despite not having Baron Davis in the line-up because he fouled out with 2:10 left in regulation, UCLA would dominate the extra five minutes. Henderson, who had a team-high 20 points, scored seven of the Bruins' 12 overtime points.

"'Bruins in ruins,' that's a bunch of bull," Henderson said. "We're just a team that is trying to get better and trying to improve."

In its first game since Jelani McCoy's resignation, the Bruin bench came through for UCLA. Freshman Rico Hines had his second straight impressive performance with seven points and six rebounds, including one board near the end of overtime that helped seal the Trojan (7-17, 3-11) casket.

Barbara nine times throughout the night. Sophomore setter Brandon Taliaferro did the most damage as he blasted a match-high five aces. However, the Gauchos did out-dig the Bruins 43 to 37.

"Santa Barbara made some fantastic digs out there tonight," Scates said. "The problem was that we put the big block in their face and they hit the ball out."

In game one, the Bruins never trailed and held leads of seven, eight, and nine points. The Bruins set the tone for the night as UCLA easily took game one.

Although Santa Barbara had an early lead in game two, the Bruins took advantage of five straight hitting errors to go up 8-5. The Gauchos would close the gap to two at 11-9 but a kill by Fred Robins and three more hitting errors by the Gauchos would end the game. The Bruins dominated game three and effectively eliminated the Gauchos.

"We got beaten by a better team obviously," UCSB head coach Ken Preston said. "I thought we passed the ball really well. We just didn't execute on the offensive end of it."

home run of her career to go into all-time first place on the career home run chart.

Wuest, however, is modest about the team's success so far this season.

"(The team) has done fine so far. It's not Pac-10 yet; we're not playing all the time, so it's hard to tell how the team will do this year," says Wuest, a senior leader on the team.

For the Bruins' home opener against Loyola Marymount, Mother Nature tried to stop UCLA with yet another obstacle, dumping rain on the contest. Despite being soaking wet, the Bruins played error-free ball, in contrast to the Lions' five errors over both games.

Again, UCLA rode the arms of Swenson and Weiler, who notched a complete game victory and seven scoreless innings, respectively. The fabulous freshmen have given up an astounding two earned runs over 43 innings of work so far.

The poise and demeanor of the two rookies has impressed their teammates. Fritz said, "I didn't expect so much confidence in a lot of the new girls. They've done really well."

> I'm impressed with ... how flexible we can be as a team."
> Sue Enquist
> Head coach

Enquist agrees that the team as a whole has exhibited exceptional confidence, and backed it up with their play.

"Our senior leadership is coming forward, our pitching is coming through really well ... I'm impressed with our work ethic, how well we can rebound, and how flexible we can be as a team based on our opponent."

Next up for the as-yet untested softball team is the Campbell/Cartier Classic, a tournament taking place in San Diego this weekend. The Bruins will kick off the Classic against Stanford today, in a non-conference game that will be an omen for how well UCLA will fare in Pac-10 play. The tournament will also include matches against Long Beach State, University of Michigan, Louisiana State and San Diego State.

"This weekend we play a lot of teams that are excellent, that are ranked in the top 10. It should be a good test and a good barometer of where we are," says Coach Enquist.

"We just have to have solid defense, get timely hitting, and play-our-guts-out style of play."

No matter the trials and tribulations to come for the Bruins in the days ahead, one has to believe that they'll get through them, if their showing so far is any indication.

As Laurie Fritz puts it, "We have a lot of heart, which will take us a long way."

DAVIS-WATSON

would be struggling right now, obviously, without the heart and play and hustle of those two."

If it weren't for Baron Davis and Earl Watson, the 12th-ranked Bruins would have at least one extra mark in the loss column. UCLA scraped by with the 68-66 victory over Oregon at Pauley Pavilion thanks in part to the dynamic duo's last second heroics.

With 25 seconds left, the score tied and the Ducks with the ball, Watson used his quick hands to steal the ball and Davis finished it off with the game-winning layup.

> The starting freshmen's compatibility on the court has ... helped the Bruins achieve their 20-5 record.

But UCLA's Batman and Robin didn't just save the day on that one occasion. The starting freshmen's compatibility on the court has not only produced spectacular plays that have awed many a Pauley crowd, but it has helped the Bruins achieve their 20-5 record.

And the Baron and the Earl will help lead UCLA against No. 2 Duke on Sunday.

"I think that they have great chemistry," fellow freshman Rico Hines said. "They know how to find each other in the open court and Earl knows how to pitch the ball ahead and create off the fast break and Baron is a great finder and a great finisher."

UCLA head coach Steve Lavin said: "They remind me of Hope and Crosby, Ed McMahon-Johnny Carson, Fred Astaire-Gene Kelly. They just have a special feel for one another and there's a special chemistry that exists between the two of them."

That special chemistry on the court has its basic roots off the court. Davis and Watson aren't just a great pair on the hardwood. They watch movies together, they play video games together, they take classes together, they rap together, they live together.

"We go everywhere together," Davis said. "We basically do everything together."

"You see him," Watson said,"you see me."

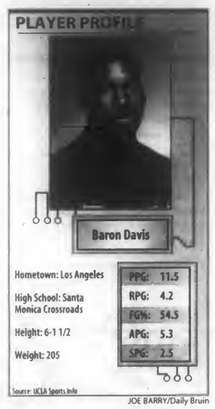
Kind of surprising when you think about their personalities. Watson is the quiet, reserved one and Davis, as Hines put it, "talks enough for everybody." But for whatever reason, they are best friends and they are inseparable.

"I guess it's like opposites attract," Davis said. "But we just get along, we both share the same type of personal qualities."

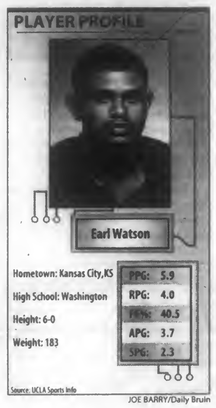
Though they come from states that are miles and miles apart, their friendship started long before the first day of fall classes.

As two of the nation's top prep players, Davis and Watson would run up phone bills talking about life and the recruiting process they were going through. But their recruiting experiences were just about as far apart as their hometowns.

Watson's college choice garnered a lot of interest in Kansas, while Davis' decision gained headlines across the nation. While Watson was chided for being a Benedict Arnold, Davis was the focus of NCAA investigations.



JOE BARRY/Daily Bruin



JOE BARRY/Daily Bruin

When Watson signed with UCLA, the 6-foot guard disappointed the people of the Sunflower State who were hoping that the Washington High School senior from Kansas City would play for Kansas.

"One day me and my teacher got into it in class about Kansas and UCLA," Watson said. "We were going at it, he got mad at me, he just left the room and everybody started laughing. He was a Kansas alumni. That was my whole school – Kansas alumni. So I was labeled as a traitor, but it was all in good nature and in good fun.

"All it did was make me work harder, they asked for it."

Meanwhile, the attention that Los Angeles native Davis received almost made him give up on college basketball altogether.

Controversy engulfed the recruitment of the nation's top prep point guard. Former UCLA head coach Jim Harrick was interrogated by the NCAA about the circumstances surrounding the sale of a used car that belonged to Harrick's son to Lisa Hodoh, Davis' sister, plastering the then-17 year old's name all over the sports pages of local and national press.

"I just questioned what I really wanted to do and whether I really wanted to play basketball if I had to put up with all this," Davis said about the incident. "There were so many emotions involved and me just being a kid and not really knowing how (to deal with it), it was just like I was falling apart."

However, with the help of his grandmother Lela Nicholson, who had raised Davis since he was three years old, and his sister, the 6-2 guard decided to go ahead with the college route. And his grandmother was a major factor in helping him make his college selection.

Though Davis had committed to UCLA during the early signing period, he reneged when Harrick was dismissed.

He then considered going, ironically enough, to Kansas, but finally revealed his choice on national television in April.

"(My grandmother) has just been there for me and I couldn't see why I couldn't do the same," Davis said. "By going away, I wouldn't be there when she needed me. That's the main reason why I came here to be close to her and just be able to have that relationship instead of making it long distance."

But regardless of the paths that eventually brought them to Westwood, the backcourt tandem's friendship has shaped itself into the best pair of freshman guards in the country. Davis averages 11.5 points, 4.2 rebounds and 5.3 assists and Watson contributes 5.9 points, 4.0 boards and 3.7 assists.

"If we didn't hang around I wouldn't know what to expect from him," Watson said. "But we do everything together so I just know every time where he's going to be on the court."

Watson's sixth-sense for Davis' whereabouts was no more evident than in their ESP-worthy variation of an allyoop against Oregon State on Jan. 8. Watson threw the ball off the glass and out of nowhere, Davis rose up amongst the Beavers to slam it home.

"(Our friendship) helps out a lot," Watson said. "You're going to see as we get older, through the years that we play together, how much it helps."

Bruin bats overcome Lions' hearts

BASEBALL: Awaiting Stanford showdown, No. 14 UCLA shuts down late rally by LMU to win 10-4

By Vytas Mazeika
Daily Bruin Staff

When a baseball team allows a lot of hits but few runs, it's called scattering hits.

When a team allows few hits but a lot of runs, it's called being victimized by the hits.

On Wednesday, the UCLA pitching staff scattered the hits while the Loyola Marymount staff was victimized by them.

In front of a crowd of 102 at Jackie Robinson Stadium, the No. 14 Bruins (7-4) took advantage of almost every chance they got against the visiting Lions (6-5-1) to wind up with their sixth-straight win by a score of 10-4. The dominant victory provides the Bruins with some much needed confidence before a showdown against top-ranked Stanford this weekend at home.

"It feels good," junior outfielder Eric Valent, who in the bottom of the seventh hit his fourth home run in four games, said. "Things are coming along. I think that's our sixth win in a row. We're playing good. No errors on the board today. Our pitchers did pretty good. Everything is just coming along pretty good."

The Bruin pitchers looked sharp early – especially sophomore starter Ryan Reightley. Pitching only two innings in order to start again on Sunday against the Cardinal, Reightley retired all six men he faced in only 23 pitches.

Sophomore Gabe Crecion (1-0) pitched four innings of relief. He allowed only five hits and an outstanding zero walks to lower from an astronomical 32.40 ERA to a more respectable 7.45.

> "Guys are getting better and as long as they keep improving we'll be good."
> Tim Leary
> Pitching coach

Only one of UCLA's five pitchers suffered from control problems. After pitching a perfect seventh inning, freshman hurler Charles Merricks walked three and allowed one hit before being pulled in the eighth inning – LMU's best offensive inning by far.

"I praised the pitching staff," UCLA head coach Gary Adams said. "I felt like that was the difference in the game up to that point. We hadn't walked anybody and they had. It was just a good outing by our pitching staff."

UCLA's pitching coach Tim Leary believes that experience gained by this young pitching staff early in the season is finally starting to show.

"Guys are getting better and as long as they keep improving we'll be good," Leary said. "There's a lot of potential on this team."

On the offensive end, LMU accumulated more hits than the Bruins (8-7), but UCLA's philosophy of swinging for the fences on Wednesday translated into four extra-base hits – two triples (left fielder Brett Nista, Valent) and two homers (first baseman Cassidy Olson, Valent).

"What I think happened is we've been hitting these old, water-logged balls for so long because of the rain in Cal," Nista, who extended his team-high hitting streak to 12 with his triple, explained. "We broke out some nice white ones today and everyone was trying to see just how far they could hit it."

Another important statistic was the zero errors allowed by the Bruin defense. For the first time in 11 games UCLA played flawless defense.

On a down note, fifth-year senior Nick Theodorou will be out three to six weeks with a torn right hamstring.

Theodorou, UCLA's starting second baseman, suffered the injury on Friday at Cal while sliding into second base on an attempted steal.

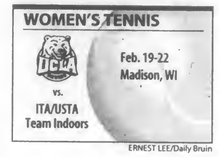
Junior Jack Santora will take Theodorou's place on the field for the Bruins.

Team hopes injuries won't keep players from victory

W. TENNIS: UCLA expects indoor gameplay to be an advantage in tournament

By Jared Hummel
Daily Bruin Contributor

Fresh off the injury list and with only one match each under their belts, sophomore Katia Roubanova and freshman Cristina Popescu will receive a baptism by fire today.



ERNEST LEE/Daily Bruin

Those two will join forces with the rest of the UCLA women's tennis team as they take on the nation's best at the USA/ITA Women's National Indoor Team Tennis Championship.

The Bruins will square off against No. 11 William and Mary University today at 9 a.m.

This tournament features 16 schools out of the Rolex Collegiate Tennis Ranking's top.

Eight matches will be played daily, culminating with the two teams with the best records playing each other in the championship finals on Feb. 22.

UCLA head coach Stella Sampras is confident about her team's chances going into this highly competitive tournament, partially because the matches are all played indoors.

"Our team plays well indoors," Sampras said.

"We have a lot of big hitters, big serves and that (type of) game plays well indoors: I think we'll do really well."

The Bruins have yet to win a title in this tournament, although they reached the finals in 1990 and 1995.

If UCLA can get past William and Mary today they will most likely play No. 1 seeded Duke in tomorrow's matchup.

Duke enters the tournament ranked No. 3 in the nation but is undefeated in dual match play, including an impressive 8-1 victory over Wisconsin, the tournament's host.

The Bruin's No. 1 player, sophomore Annica Cooper, with her perfect 6-0 record in dual match play, has earned herself a No. 26 ranking. She will take on William and Mary senior and No. 12-ranked Lauren Nikolaus.

This tournament should be a good test of this UCLA team's talent.

By Sunday evening Coach Sampras should know where her team's strengths and weaknesses lie. As a result, she will know what needs to be worked on in the coming weeks.

Suns 110, Lakers 103

The NBA playoffs are still months away, but you wouldn't know it by the game faces of the Phoenix Suns.

Rex Chapman scored seven of his 26 points in the final 6:36 as the Suns snapped an eight-game losing streak to the Los Angeles Lakers with a 110-103 win Wednesday night.

"It was pretty intense out there, like a playoff game for us," said Chapman, who made a key basket with 91 seconds remaining to blunt a Laker rally. "We kept our composure and focus out there and everybody made plays. The big thing is we gained a full game on them in the standings. We want to make a run and finish as strong as we can."

Cliff Robinson added 25 points and Antonio McDyess had 20 and 11 rebounds for the Suns, who won their third in a row and eighth in the last 11 games.

Los Angeles dropped its third straight despite Shaquille O'Neal's 30 points and 20 from Eddie Jones. The Lakers played without All-Star guard Nick Van Exel, who has a sore right knee.

"I'm not going to make excuses, but the Suns made great shots – off the wrong-leg jumpers – and we just couldn't keep up with that," O'Neal said. "They were hitting huge shots, especially Chapman. It seemed like everything he threw up went in all night."

There were 16 ties and 11 lead changes before Phoenix went ahead to stay at 86-84 with 8:58 remaining when McDyess slammed in Danny Manning's missed layup.

George McCloud, who had 14 points, sank his second 3-pointer of the game with 8:33 left and added a jumper with 7:40 showing to give the Suns a 91-86 lead.

When O'Neal and Rick Fox were each hit with technical fouls for arguing a charging call, Chapman converted both free throws with 6:36 to play to make it 93-87.

Chapman's 3-point goal – his fifth and Phoenix's ninth in 14 tries – put Phoenix up 100-89 with 5:01 left.

But Jones scored four points in an 8-0 run as the Lakers took a 100-97 lead on Derek Fisher's free throws with 2:48 remaining.

Elden Campbell, who finished with 16 points off the bench, got the Lakers within 102-100 on a three-point play with 1:48 to play.

Chapman drove the baseline and hit a running right-hander with 1:31 left and McDyess had an uncontested dunk off Robinson's feed for a 106-101 lead with 57 seconds to play.

Robinson's off-balance jumper from the left wing made it 108-103 with 20.8 seconds left to seal the Suns' first win over the Lakers since Nov. 25, 1995.

Warriors 88, Hornets 77

All it takes is a team shakeup to shape up the Golden State Warriors.

"It seems like we've played our best basketball this season in the face of adversity," said coach P.J. Carlesimo after the Warriors defeated the Charlotte Hornets 88-77 Wednesday night.

Playing without traded starters Joe Smith and Brian Shaw, and still awaiting the arrival of Jimmy Jackson and Clarence Weatherspoon from Philadelphia, Golden State never trailed after halftime

"We can focus more now," said Donyell Marshall, who along with Tony Delk scored a team-high 20 points. "We know who's going to be here. We can just go out there and play."

After terminating Latrell Sprewell's contract last December, the Warriors won six of their next 12 games, their best stretch of the season.

Then they lost 22 of 23 leading up to the trade rumors swirling around Smith last weekend. Now they've won two straight at home, beating a winning team for just the third time this season.

Bruins swing for slice of history with attempt to pull off 3-peat

M. TENNIS: UCLA has difficult opposition to beat in quest for team indoor championship title

By Stephanie Chan
Daily Bruin Contributor

For the UCLA men's tennis program, setting records is nothing new. The Bruins are tied with Stanford and USC for holding the most NCAA team titles with 15 apiece. But one record that only UCLA is in the position to own this season is the label of first school to win three straight USTA/ITA Men's National Team Indoor Championships titles.

Last year, the Bruins defeated Fresno State, Duke, Mississippi and Georgia en route to the 1997 National Team Indoor title.

Starting today and lasting until Sunday, the Bruins will be fending off the top teams in the nation in search of the three-peat. The tournament field includes the nation's 12 top-ranked teams and four regional representatives. All of the teams are in the top 25.

UCLA has only played one of the teams in this field of 16, the only team they have lost to – USC. Pepperdine, who the Bruins were scheduled to play but did not due to rain, is also among the pool of UCLA's potential competitors.

First up for the No. 2 Bruins is No. 15 Illinois. Excluding tournament appearances, the Illini enter the National Team Indoors 1-0 with a victory over No. 21 Northwestern. They are ranked No. 1 in their region and boast two ranked players, No. 57 Oliver Freelove and No. 86 Cary Franklin.

The new February ITA rankings have UCLA's Vince Allegre at No. 9, Jean-Noel Grinda at No. 12, Matt Breen at No. 30 and Jason Cook at No. 77. The only Bruin to move up the ladder was Breen, jumping up from No. 54.

The team enters the tournament 6-1 overall and 2-1 in Pac-10 play.

If UCLA wins today's match they will face the winner of the No. 5 Mississippi/No. 12 Pepperdine match on Friday.

When the stakes are high, so is the adrenaline. If the Bruins pump it up for this tournament, they'll own a record they won't have to share with Stanford and Southern Cal.

Rookies step up to the plate with confidence

FEATURE: Team unites, shares leadership duties for surprising success

"Its the end of the world as we know it," could have been the theme song this year for the UCLA softball team.

But a funny thing happened in between the tear-jerking loss to Arizona in the World Series last year and the opening game of this year's probation season.

An influx of rookies showed up in Westwood to complete the REM song, "and they feel fine."

This year could have been the nail in the coffin for a program which appeared to be hit with the bats they were playing with. The NCAA ruled to let the Bruins finish last year but this year they can't make the playoffs.

The alarm went off at UCLA and many of the all-stars on the team decided to redshirt, and the freshman phenom, Christa Williams, transferred and took with her 218 strikeouts.

But when the dust settled back onto the basepaths, nine new players were waiting to show the world what UCLA pride was about. With a bit of senior leadership, the Bruins are 6-0 heading into this weekend's tournament.

The seniors may have started out the season carrying the team but now the leadership is taken over by new players each game.

"As the team meshed, different people have shown leadership in different areas," pitching sensation Lindsey Gayer said.

The new players had to pick up some of the leadership roles because they have to pick up right where the team last year left off. With a past filled with stories like UCLA softball, every year is remembered and every team is aiming to beat the Bruins.

"The new players have to come into the program following phenomenal athletes and it is overwhelming," Nicole Odom, senior shortstop, said. "But they have done a great job ... every time they are on the field they are representing UCLA, but they handle it because they are fighters."

One of the toughest fighters can be found behind the plate, Carissa Millsap, catching for three new UCLA pitchers to an ERA of under one.

"Millsap has done an excellent job with the young pitching staff and carries a little pop in her bat," assistant coach Kelly Inouye-Perez said.

That power was exhibited against Saint Mary's when she cranked her first UCLA homer. But things aren't as easy as they seem for Millsap, as her average has fallen to a paltry .111 through six games.

"It is hard coming in because I came from a different system with different coaches," Millsap, a Hofstra transfer, said. "But this team is unshakable. Whatever is thrown at us we just pick it up and take it in stride."

Probation will keep UCLA from all post-season play

VIOLATION: Appeal means that, regardless of season outcome, Bruins can't compete in this year's playoffs

By Rocky Salmon
Daily Bruin Senior Staff

A shadow looms large over Easton Stadium this year. A large, dark gloom which dampens every win the softball team musters this year hangs in the sky above.

Last year the only shadows on the softball diamond were from the players laughing and getting ready for the NCAA Tournament.

With a No. 5 ranking going into the Regionals, the Bruins were gunning for their eighth national title. Owning a 21-7 conference record and pitching powerhouses Christa Williams and B'Ann Burns, UCLA was ready for the 'Big Dance'.

But then lightning struck.

The softball program had skeletons in the closets which were unearthed once more and UCLA felt the wrath of the NCAA Committee. On the verge of another World Series run, the Bruins were suspended from the post-season and put on probation for the 97-98 year.

In 93-94 and 94-95, the softball program awarded more scholarships than they were allotted. In 96-97 the skeletons came back out to destroy the hopes and dreams of the Bruin softball team.

In May, the devastating news hit the squad as they prepared for their final games before the Regionals.

"We were about to go to the World

Bruins leave disaster behind, start season with winning streak

SOFTBALL: Young team relies on positive attitude to go beyond obstacles

By Traci Mack
Daily Bruin Senior Staff

They never saw them coming.

After all, what chance does a team riddled with the defection of Christa Williams to Texas, the graduation of a majority of its marquee players, and a controversial suspension from the NCAA tournament have in the competitive world of college softball?

A better chance than most, apparently.

The UCLA Bruins, beset with obstacles that rival those of the men's basketball team, have left negativity in their wake en route to a 6-0 start this season. With decisive victories over St. Mary's, Santa Clara University, and Loyola Marymount, the Bruins have proven that they have guts and ability to spare. UCLA has outscored its opponents 31-7 in its first six contests.

Assistant coach Kelly Inouye-Perez summed it up perfectly, saying, "We came out playing UCLA ball from the start."

"A majority of the teams we've played (so far this season) were excellent teams to start off against, because these games provide a lot of confidence," says head coach Sue Enquist.

If the Bruins were in need of confidence before, playing against St. Mary's boosted it for them. The Bruins defeated the Gaels handily, winning 7-1 and 5-2, behind the torrid hitting of senior Laurie Fritz.

ERNEST LEE/Daily Bruin

Fritz, who so far this season is batting .421, led the Bruins with three runs scored in both contests combined.

"Every team wants to get us, because there are some teams who have never beaten us," says Fritz.

No matter how badly the Gaels wanted to "get" the Bruins, they failed miserably. St. Mary's only managed to notch five hits over the course of both games, thanks to pitchers Stephanie Swenson and Erin Weiler.

Pitching was also the story of the Santa Clara series. Swenson and Weiler once again held the opponent's bats silent, holding the Broncos to only one run scored.

The Bruins, on the other hand, had no problem getting across the plate, scoring 11 runs in the two games. One of those runs belonged to Kim Wuest, who belted the 21st

Bruins pull out all stops in overtime

M. HOOPS: Bailey takes control to turn around game against Trojans with Henderson's help

By Emmanuelle Ejercito
Daily Bruin Senior Staff

It's something that the No. 12 UCLA men's basketball team hasn't seen in awhile – a smile on Toby Bailey's face. And boy, did he have reason to smile.

Bailey had a huge hand in the Bruins' much-needed overtime victory over USC, 82-75, coming up with the key rebounds, dishing out the needed assists and making the clutch shots, before a split crowd of 7,167 at the Los Angeles Sports Arena on Wednesday night.

The 6-foot-5-inch guard was coming off of a sub-par performance against California last Saturday, when he was two-of-nine from the field, scored only seven points and committed eight turnovers in his 39 minutes. The stats were the after-effects of the 84-81 Stanford loss in which Bailey slipped in the waning seconds as he tried to go for the game-tying basket.

"I was just mentally drained, I think that Stanford game took a lot out of me," Bailey said. "After falling down, I was thinking about that every night before going to sleep."

Even his practices were affected. Bailey, for the first time since his freshman year, didn't start the first half of the Southern Cal match-up. UCLA head coach Steve Lavin didn't start the senior because of his lack of intensity in practice.

"He's done a tremendous amount for UCLA basketball so by no means am I down on Toby Bailey, or he's in my doghouse," Lavin said. "It's just a simple wake-up call to let him know that you've got to practice with high energy, you've got to play with high energy and I thought tonight he did a great job of that."

Disgraceful men, graceful women should face off in grudge match

COLUMN: Battle of the century might be more balanced than you think

It has been pretty insane around the sports department for the last few hours, because we've all been working the phones like mad. Don King, Vince McMahon, even those ASUCLA employees who put on movies all the time, any and all promoters have been our targets because I have hit upon a pay-per-view gold mine.

Mark Shapiro

In light of recent ice-bound events in Nagano, I suddenly reached a position of perfect clarity as this idea was revealed.

I am absolutely certain that this possible matchup would galvanize the nation and relegate the Bobby Riggs/Billie Jean King "Battle of the Sexes" to has-been status.

I can see it in lights hung over a custom-made rink at the Mirage ...

"The Golden Ladies of the Puck" vs. "The Goats of Nagano," as the men's and women's U.S. hockey teams get set to play each other.

Now, everyone probably reflexively thinks that such a matchup would be a blowout, that it would take the idea of gender-bashing to a level that Thelma and Louise could never have possibly considered.

The default feeling is probably that one team would capitalize on its recent hype and turn the opposition into the laughingstock of its sex.

But that really wouldn't be the case. I don't think that the game would be a blowout at all, even though one of the teams would certainly be a prohibitive underdog.

Seriously, I really think the men could give their female counterparts a run for their money, even though all results and even common sense would point to the contrary.

I know that the hockey counterpart to international basketball's Dream Team was supposed to at least make a run for the gold at Nagano. And I know that our col-

Great play sets Bruins up for win over Gauchos

M. VOLLEYBALL: Despite a new lineup and limited practice time, UCLA goes in for quick, merciful kill

By Grace Wen

Chalk up another win for the UCLA men's volleyball team.

The Bruins took even less time to dispose of UCSB than it did for the San Diego schools. In less than an hour-and-a-half, UCLA swept the Gauchos 15-6, 15-9, 15-4.

"It was a new lineup with two days' practice, so I was pleased with it," UCLA head coach Al Scates said.

"Ben (Moselle) got off to a pretty slow start that first game. We started out pumping him a lot of sets just to see if he could do it but he got it home. He made some real nice blocks so it gives us yet more flexibility than we had prior to this match."

Moselle, who moved to the opposite position after Evan Thatcher was sidelined with back spasms, led the team in hitting with 12 kills and two errors in 21 attempts for a .476 clip. Normally a swing hitter, he also recorded two solo blocks and two block assists.

"I still have a lot of things to learn," Moselle said. "But, I like the hitting aspect. I like to hit a lot of sets and I like to stay in the flow of hitting.

"I blocked a few balls at the end so I was starting to get comfortable blocking on the right side. I don't have a feel for the digging yet."

But it wasn't only Moselle who had the offensive firepower. The Bruin offense overpowered the Gauchos. UCLA hit .439 while holding UCSB to a measly .200.

Junior Fred Robins spiked 10 kills in 17 attempts with no errors for a .588 hitting percentage. Robins also posted a team-high 12 digs. In his first match back from injury, sophomore Adam Naeve also contributed 12 kills. UCLA also outblocked the Gauchos nine to five. In addition the Bruins aced Santa

M. VOLLEYBALL: Despite a new lineup and limited practice time, UCLA goes in for quick, merciful kill

By Grace Wen
Daily Bruin Staff

Chalk up another win for the UCLA men's volleyball team.

The Bruins took even less time to dispose of UCSB than it did for the San Diego schools. In less than an hour-and-a-half, UCLA swept the Gauchos 15-6, 15-9, 15-4.

"It was a new lineup with two days' practice, so I was pleased with it," UCLA head coach Al Scates said.

"Ben (Moselle) got off to a pretty slow start that first game. We started out pumping him a lot of sets just to see if he could do it but he got it home. He made some real nice blocks so it gives us yet more flexibility than we had prior to this match."

Moselle, who moved to the opposite position after Evan Thatcher was sidelined with back spasms, led the team in hitting with 12 kills and two errors in 21 attempts for a .476 clip. Normally a swing hitter, he also recorded two solo blocks and two block assists.

"I still have a lot of things to learn," Moselle said. "But, I like the hitting aspect. I like to hit a lot of sets and I like to stay in the flow of hitting.

"I blocked a few balls at the end so I was starting to get comfortable blocking on the right side. I don't have a feel for the digging yet."

But it wasn't only Moselle who had the offensive firepower. The Bruin offense overpowered the Gauchos. UCLA hit .439 while holding UCSB to a measly .200.

Junior Fred Robins spiked 10 kills in 17 attempts with no errors for a .588 hitting percentage. Robins also posted a team-high 12 digs. In his first match back from injury, sophomore Adam Naeve also contributed 12 kills. UCLA also outblocked the Gauchos nine to five. In addition the Bruins aced Santa

COLUMN: Battle of the century might be more balanced than you think

Mark Shapiro

It has been pretty insane around the sports department for the last few hours, because we've all been working the phones like mad. Don King, Vince McMahon, even those ASUCLA employees who put on movies all the time, any and all promoters have been our targets because I have hit upon a pay-per-view gold mine.

In light of recent ice-bound events in Nagano, I suddenly reached a position of perfect clarity as this idea was revealed.

I am absolutely certain that this possible matchup would galvanize the nation and relegate the Bobby Riggs/Billie Jean King "Battle of the Sexes" to has-been status.

I can see it in lights hung over a custom-made rink at the Mirage ...

"The Golden Ladies of the Puck" vs. "The Goats of Nagano," as the men's and women's U.S. hockey teams get set to play each other.

Now, everyone probably reflexively thinks that such a matchup would be a blowout, that it would take the idea of gender-bashing to a level that Thelma and Louise could never have possibly considered.

The default feeling is probably that one team would capitalize on its recent hype and turn the opposition into the laughingstock of its sex.

But that really wouldn't be the case. I don't think that the game would be a blowout at all, even though one of the teams would certainly be a prohibitive underdog.

Seriously, I really think the men could give their female counterparts a run for their money, even though all results and even common sense would point to the contrary.

I know that the hockey counterpart to international basketball's Dream Team was supposed to at least make a run for the gold at Nagano. And I know that our col-

Managing care

Health plan aims to reduce medical fees while providing better, more efficient treatment for patients

By Kathryn Combs
Daily Bruin Staff

The controversy surrounding whether or not managed care is helping or hurting California's health care system is still brewing.

Late last month, Gov. Pete Wilson unveiled his principles for the reform of managed care in California. Wilson indicated that any legislation should adhere to one very important principle: to preserve or improve the quality of care without diminishing access or harming the health of California's economy.

Managed care is a health care plan designed to cut the cost of medical services while improving patient outcomes.

Despite all the political flurry, medical center officials at UCLA say that managed care has had both positive and negative effects on the delivery of health care in the last 12 years.

"It does work," said Mary Frances Flynn, director of Managed Care Business Development.

"It is a different system for people to learn, and as a patient there are many more perceived challenges in terms of receiving care," Flynn said.

Nearly 85 percent of Californians currently receive medical attention under managed care programs. However, just over 75 percent express satisfaction with these services, according to the Office of the Governor.

"From the perception of the patient, managed care doesn't give them the freedom of choice that they have had in the past," said Dr. Michael Karpf, vice provost for hospital services at UCLA.

"It is not quite as open as the health care system used to be," he added. Karpf was a member of the task force that contributed to Wilson's proposals.

According to Gerald Levey, provost of the UCLA School of Medicine, managed care has a positive impact on the university.

"Managed care has done some very good things for UCLA," said Levey.

"It has forced us to look at all aspects of our operations and essentially made us a far more efficient hospital," Levey said.

"It has enabled us to do things that five years ago would have been unimaginable," he added.

Managed care has allowed the university to extend services outward to the surrounding community, Levey said.

As a result, UCLA has built clinics in the surrounding community and acquired the Santa Monica hospital in 1995 as part of the UCLA health care net-

Students wait to take the bus at the Ackerman turnaround. The new buses hold fewer passengers.

Better buses bring bigger lines

CROWDING: Vehicles leave air cleaner, but hold fewer passengers

By Scot Sargeant
Daily Bruin Contributor

Although UCLA's new campus buses benefit the environment, they have caused new problems for students.

UCLA's new environmentally friendly buses, which were introduced in January, hold fewer students than previous buses.

These buses, which run on natural gas rather than diesel fuel, contain 33 seats, instead of the previous buses' 36-seat capacity. Students are finding themselves waiting in increasingly longer lines.

"Ever since they started using these new buses, I've been late to classes several times. I have to get to the stop a half-hour early sometimes," said one student who wished to remain anonymous.

This concern appears to be shared by students who have expressed frustration over the longer wait.

"If you aren't one of the first people to run onto the bus, you will be left standing," said Angela Lang, a third-year sociology student.

While the change in the number of seats may seem minimal, seating is not the only thing that affects capacity.

"The standing capacity is where we really see the difference," said Sherry Lewis, general manager for UCLA Fleet and Transit Services.

The total capacity in the new buses, including seats and standing room, is approximately 45 people. The old buses, by contrast, could hold about 55 students.

Transit officials acknowledge receiving complaints from students, but no clear solution appears to exist.

"I'm not sure how many people have called transit, but I have received some complaints. Most of the complaints I have received have dealt with the morning traffic," Lewis said.

"There are so many students there that want a ride, and the buses are so full when they come by, that they can't even stop," she continued.

Officials of UCLA Fleet and Transit Services are aware of the problem and are investigating methods to ease the waiting time for students.

"We are also looking into some other alternatives ... such as using some of the older buses, or redesigning the routes," she continued.

According to Lewis, UCLA has a supply of 11 new buses, but only eight are normally used.

Six of these buses are designated to the Campus Express route, which constitutes the core route around campus, while two buses cover the Ackerman route. Occasionally, a ninth bus is utilized to alleviate student traffic.

"There have been several times where we have put an additional bus on to minimize the impact to students," Lewis said.

"It's my understanding that there is a lot of overcrowding now. What we're trying to measure right now is how many people are being left behind because of the buses being full," Lewis said.

Boelter chemical accident produces desired reaction

SPILLS: Mishap proves HazMat, precautions can easily handle cleanups

By Mason Stockstill
Daily Bruin Senior Staff

A chemical spill Thursday morning caused Boelter Hall to be evacuated while UCLA Hazardous Materials (HazMat) cleanup squads secured the area.

Four one-gallon containers of ammonium hydroxide broke open when the shelving unit that they were stored on apparently collapsed.

"This is more than just a minor spill," said Michael Ceser, manager of education and training programs in the office of environmental health and safety.

Ceser considered the cleanup of the spill "a success" because numerous safety precautions prevented any casualties.

"The lab took all the necessary precautions, and everything went like clockwork," he said.

The cause of the spill has yet to be determined, but apparently the shelving unit that the bottles were stored on collapsed when an employee was putting away some other chemicals.

"The chemicals were properly stored, but the storage unit gave way, which caused the spill," Ceser said.

After the initial entry team had cleaned up the spill, they discovered that an acid spill may have also occurred.

The team then re-entered the building in different protective suits, because of differing levels of exposure to the chemicals. Apparently, they didn't find another spill.

The cleanup teams use meters to measure the amount of gases in the air, so that they will know when the caustic gases have dropped to an acceptable level.

Ceser said that there were no casualties reported as a result of the spill.

"Everything is potentially dangerous," he said, "but at this exposure level, there is no risk of death."

The building was evacuated after the protection devices in the building detected the chemical in the air and set off the alarms.

Ioannis Kanellakopoulos, an associate professor of electrical engineering, left the building after the alarm went off.

"There are sirens, strobe lights and a PA saying, 'Please evacuate the building,'" he said.

According to Ceser, the system detected the gas in the air, triggered

COMMUNITY BRIEFS

Leave Iraq alone, Spartacists, others say

"U.S. Get Your Bloody Hands Off Of The World" read one of several banners strewn across Meyerhoff Park at noon on Thursday as Spartacus, an anti-government student organization, staged a rally in protest of military aggression in Iraq.

Impassioned speeches were given by members of both Spartacus and the Muslim Students group, each time punctuated by a different chant:

"Defend Iraq. Down with U.S. imperialist attacks," shouted Paco repeatedly, the first of three speakers who refused to give his last name.

Michelle Oberman, a senior sociology student and self-described socialist, exhorted students to "defend the Palestinians" and "get ROTC off campus" during her turn on the mic, saying afterward: "We want a class struggle to defeat U.S. imperialism," adding ruefully, "I live in this society but I'm not part of this society."

Spectators who took interest objected at times to the vitriolic nature of the speeches, one onlooker even clapping in mock appreciation after one of the speakers.

On balance, however, the scene was greeted with cynicism and lack of interest. "I think it's just kind of trendy to be anti-U.S. policy these days," said Jason Nuesca, a third-year history student.

Law school rankings cry wolf, study says

Annual law school rankings relied upon by both prospective students and scouting law firms have a poor grasp of facts and should be ignored, according to an association of 162 of the nation's law schools.

The rankings in question are published each year by U.S. News & World Report. According to the nonprofit Association of American Law Schools, the ranking report has "many serious problems" and is "misleading and dangerous" says John Sexton, dean of the New York University School of Law.

Sexton states that the biggest problems rankings have are that they assume every applicant has identical needs and desires, and the rankings "are driven by a reputation survey of persons who have little or no knowledge of what they are ranking."

Other complaints from the Washington-based association are that the magazine rates schools using the median scores from law school admissions tests and also through the expenditure per student. These methods do not take into consideration of the quality of instruction and actually ends up penalizing a school that provides top-quality education at a low cost per student.

The magazine said the rankings, to appear in its March 2 issue, provide an efficient way for comparing schools based on independent assessment and the gathering of judgments that experts have made about each law school. The magazine also claims that the ratings are only a guide, it is not for readers to "substitute someone else's ranking system for (their) own best judgment."

Protesters to march to 'Save the Dream'

Thousands of people are expected to attend Monday's "Save the Dream" march to support affirmative action and oppose Proposition 226, the proposed "Anti-Labor" initiative.

According to an L.A. County Federation of Labor press release, Proposition 226 would make it illegal for unions to donate money to politics without a going through a difficult process, making it harder for union members to have their voice heard in upcoming November elections.

Statistics say corporations outspent unions 17 to one in donating money in the 1996 elections.

The city-wide rally is sponsored by, among others, the Rev. Jesse Jackson, the Rainbow Coalition and the ACLU.

The march begins at 8 a.m. in front of the Los Angeles Memorial Coliseum and ends at the Ronald Reagan State Building.

People still know surprisingly little of Malcolm X and the battle he fought

In memory of Malcolm

By Carol McKay
Daily Bruin Staff

Over 70 years ago, a legend was born in Omaha. His name was Malcolm Little. Later, it would be El Hajj Malik el-Shabazz. Eventually, the world would know him as Malcolm X. But 33 years after his death, most still know amazingly little about him.

Perhaps the mystery stems from his numerous identities, his evolution of ideologies. Perhaps it was his oratorical command. Or perhaps it was the short span of the public's attention.

One thing is clear, however; despite how little people know about Malcolm X, most feel awe for this historical figure.

After losing his parents at a young age, Malcolm Little left school early and turned to a life of crime in the underworld of Harlem. Dealing and using drugs, he was sent to prison in 1946 for a 10-year sentence.

While in prison, he explored Islamic studies and converted to the black nationalist theology of Elijah Muhammad.

After his release from prison, Malcolm sought publicity, delivering inflammatory speeches and gaining much attention. He served as the leader of the Nation of Islam and preached a militant version of black nationalism.

Soon this attention proved detrimental, and Malcolm was suspended from the Black Muslim Movement. He began his own movement, the Organization of Afro-American Unity, and during the same year made a pilgrimage to Mecca.

In Mecca, Malcolm was transformed once again. In a letter he sent to his wife and assistants, Malcolm revealed his conversion.

"I have been utterly speechless and spellbound by the graciousness I see displayed all around me by people of all colors," he wrote.

Upon his return from the Holy City, Malcolm began a new doctrine. No longer would he hate all white people but only those who were racist.

Malcolm became tolerant of the idea of integrated cooperation among groups, aiming for progress in civil rights through the participation of other African Americans and progressive white organizations.

Malcolm was assassinated on Feb. 21, 1965. Three members of the Nation of Islam were convicted. According to Victor Wolfenstein, a professor of political science, "There is rather substantial evidence that governmental agencies were at least passively collusive.

"They did nothing to prevent this tragic event," he said, adding that two of the three men who were imprisoned for the assassination were obviously innocent.

Despite a young death that occurred on the incline of his political career, Malcolm X is not a forgotten man. His memory is celebrated on a handful of web pages, in several documentaries and in a motion picture.

In recent years, news of his daughter's alleged assassination attempts of Louis Farrakhan – which some claimed was a government setup – has made headlines.

Malcolm's daughter Qubilah Shabazz allegedly planned to assassinate Farrakhan because she believed he was responsible for her father's death.

Charges were dropped, however, when Shabazz agreed to a deal in which she would receive treatment for alcohol abuse and sign an affidavit accepting responsibility for her role in the assassination attempt. She maintained her innocence.

Last year, Malcolm's wife Betty Shabazz was burned to death, and her 12-year old grandson – the son of Qubilah Shabazz – plead guilty to the crime.

The teachings of all civil rights leaders have been called up recently as current issues such as affirmative action maintain a place in national discussion. After Malcolm's death, a return to his teachings occurred periodically throughout the following three decades. People bought copies of his autobiography by Alex Haley and anthologies of his speeches.

According to Wolfenstein, Malcolm X became one of the spiritual leaders of the black Adidas has made a comeback from the days of the Beastie Boys and Run DMC, onto the bodies of students across campus, flooding Bruin Walk and camouflaging students in three white stripes. Why is Adidas the unofficial uniform and leisure wear of choice?

radical and revolutionary movement, and his philosophies had a significant influence on the development of the Black Panther Party in the late 1960s.

Malcolm's influences lessened through the '70s and '80s, Wolfenstein said, and were revitalized during the late 1980's, when "hip-hop artists and young black people more generally began to respond to the teachings of Minister Louis Farrakhan, who had revived the Nation of Islam."

When Spike Lee directed "Malcolm X" in 1992, a new generation discovered his life and impact on society.

Paraphenilia was circulated within the popular culture, with "X" baseball caps at the forefront of the very visible trend.

Despite the passing fad's promotion of self-identity, history professor Robert Hill said that the emergence of Malcolm X hats and posters wasn't much more than capitalist-driven.

"His importance transcends any kind of fashion or fad, as any struggle for freedom does," Hill said. "It's something that goes much deeper than that."

Some students agree that Malcolm has personally influenced their own lives as well.

"I know that if I had never been exposed to his teachings, I'd still be sitting around and hoping," said Sarah Abdelhamid, a second-year psychology and African American studies student.

Abdelhamid said that the message she most values from Malcolm's philosophies is the importance of self-assertion.

"The racism in our society is not as overt as it was during his time," she said. "But his philosophies said that you can't take anything passively. Today, we can rally for and against things like Prop. 209 and affirmative action. We have to take the initiative if we want things to change."

However long ago Malcolm's efforts began, many believe that his legacy continues to apply.

"His basic stance of militant opposition to white racism remains relevant, all the more so in a time when there are massive efforts underway to roll back the gains of the 1960s freedom struggle," said Wolfenstein, who teaches a course in Malcolm X and Black Liberation

"The attack on affirmative action is just one prong of this reactionary movement."

Malcolm's teachings have continued to influence generations of Americans. According to Hill, Malcolm is responsible for many of our modern ideas about African American empowerment.

And not only has he influenced African American philosophy, but his ideas have penetrated all of the American identity.

"Through Malcolm X, we are now able to talk about institutional racism as well as individual prejudice," Hill said.

In his last years, Malcolm formulated the idea of organized discrimination and institutional responsibility, bringing the issue from an incident-based one to a community problem.

"This meant that it wasn't just an individual matter," Hill said. "It was endemic to society."

Malcolm's notions of community empowerment and personal struggle have also changed the face of societal solutions.

"His concepts of black self-determination as a domestic program (brought about) economic and social programs that talked about community empowerment and political power, police accountability and community control of schools," Hill said.

Hill credits Malcolm as articulating the vision that self-determination for African Americans meant development of their community and achieving political power for anything to change.

Malcolm emphasized "community-based consciousness," Hill said, adding that a number of African American mayors appeared with the help of his movement.

Abdelhamid does, however, find faults with some of his ways. "I don't advocate his ways of violence. I think there has to be another way," she said. "But I admire his ability to assert African Americans as people in an equal society."

Abdelhamid said that she admires him for his ability to change as well. "It's sad that it took him a trip to jail to realize that something was wrong in his life. But he made the conscious decision to follow the right path, and I admire him for that."

And the need for his influence remains.

"Malcolm's spirit of black self-affirmation and uncompromising opposition to the oppression of his people is needed as much now as it ever was," Wolfenstein said.

MANAGED CARE

work.

"(Managed care has) essentially required us to add an additional hospital for primary care, and therefore led to our acquisition of the Santa Monica hospital," Levey said.

These changes have removed the perception that UCLA is an isolated institution.

"All of these developments, which have stemmed from a managed care environment, have been very positive for UCLA. It has given UCLA a community presence which we never had before," Levey said.

According to UCLA officials, managed care, while not flawless, has created a greater level of awareness regarding what hospitals need to do to cut cost and maintain quality care.

"There is now a greater level of awareness of managed care and how medicine can benefit from it. (However) it is not without its problems and it certainly represents a change that is difficult to make," Flynn said.

Opponents complained that managed care programs are inaccessible to all patients and that the quality of care is dwindling, placing cost over care.

"On the negative side I worry, as many do, whether managed care will remove the ability of patients to have mobility in the system," Levey said.

"I also have concerns that individuals will not have access to the latest medical advances, which are often very costly," Levey said.

"Everyone should have access to the latest developments in medical technology, diagnosis and therapeutics," he continued.

Institutions like UCLA are beginning to measure how well managed care is working.

"We are expanding the number of managed care contracts we have, and have been increasing the number of members we see in both the Westwood and Santa Monica hospitals," Flynn said.

"We are expanding the number of contracts we have," she added, "so that we can make this available to more people, so that everyone will have the opportunity and choice to have UCLA as their provider."

"Managed care ... makes it easier to measure the quality of care, although quality and outcome measurement is in its early stages of development," Flynn said.

"By critically analyzing what we are doing, we can do it well and efficiently," Karpf said.

According to Karpf, managed care programs allow doctors and administrators to measure the outcomes of patient care more than the previous fee for service system.

"(Managed care) is a system that needs to be implemented and better understood," said Josie Rice, administrator with UCLA Managed Care programs.

"It's not a bad system. However, it's like any other program. It just needs time to develop," she added.

"Managed care is not disappearing," Karpf said. "It will be made a little bit more flexible, but fundamentally it is not going away."

SPILL

the alarms, shut off other automated processes that use caustic gases, and notified the fire department of the situation.

"The protection devices worked perfectly," Ceser said.

There was also a computerized command center, located in an area adjacent to Boelter, from which HazMat team members could safely observe what was going on inside the building on closed-circuit televisions.

"That process is also automated, and it went perfectly as well," Ceser said.

The Nano lab, where the spill occurred, is home to research and education in the areas of microfabrication, micromachining and integrated circuit fabrication.

> Proper safety procedures can pay off in the event of an accident.

The lab's ventilation system is independent of the rest of the building, so any gases released by the spill did not circulate throughout the rest of the building.

In addition, the chemicals stored in the lab had been segregated by compatibility, meaning that the chemicals that would react violently when mixed were stored separate from each other. In the event of an accident, there would be less chance of a reaction.

Ceser said that this incident serves to show the UCLA community that proper safety procedures can pay off in the event of an accident.

"When you go that extra mile, things come out a lot better," he said.

More U.S. troops arrive in Middle East to bolster presence

The Associated Press

U.S. Army soldiers of the 3rd Infantry Division based at Fort Stewart, Ga, are greeted as they arrive at a Kuwait City air base Thursday.

IRAQ: While Kofi Annan seeks diplomatic solution in Baghdad, United States prepares for worst

By Larry Kaplow
Cox News Service

CAMP DOHA ARMY BASE, Kuwait – The first of several thousand troops arrived to beef up the U.S. military presence, picking up equipment – from duffel bags to tanks – and speculating about chemical weapons and Iraqi President Saddam Hussein.

Though their mission is defined as a training exercise, they know that their presence in the region is meant to deter an Iraqi invasion and reassure American allies.

Many of the 384 arrivals from the 3rd Infantry Division at Fort Stewart, Ga., were groggy after a 17-hour flight on their chartered 747 airliner. But, as they gathered for food and supplies, most knew they would be headed to the Kuwaiti desert within a day.

"You know that only a few dozen kilometers away is a country that has aggressed in the past," said tank commander First Lt. Mark Walters. "It makes it a little more real. It raises what we call the 'Pucker Factor.'"

Walters, of Warren, Penn., stood next to one of the 65-ton, $2.4 million tanks that he would soon lead into the desert.

Many of the tanks and much of the other equipment on this base were used in Operation Desert Storm, which, in 1991, drove the Iraqis out of their occupation of Kuwait.

Since that war, United Nations sanctions and weapons inspections have kept the Iraqi government largely in check. But the United States has begun, in earnest, a new military build-up after repeated attempts by Hussein to close off from inspection areas where he is suspected of hiding chemical and biological weapons of mass destruction – which he has used in the past.

With U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan headed to Baghdad this weekend for what many consider the last chance at a peaceful resolution to the stand-off, the troops were coming from Fort Stewart to bolster the 25,000 U.S. servicemen and women already in the Gulf region.

By the end of the day Thursday, another 380

North seeks reconciliation with former countrymen

KOREA: Offer seen as step in right direction by leadership of South

By Paul Shin
The Associated Press

SEOUL, South Korea – North Korea appealed directly to dozens of political leaders in rival South Korea, asking them to help bring reconciliation to the divided Korean peninsula.

It was part of a marked shift in policy and a remarkable peace overture by isolated North Korea, which declared Wednesday it was ready to talk with the South's newly elected government in the interest of ending decades of confrontation.

Today, North Korea delivered 70 letters addressed to South Korean leaders urging them to work toward reconciliation. The letters were received through the border village of Panmunjom and are still being delivered.

"We make clear that we are willing to have dialogue and negotiation with anyone in South Korea, including political parties and organizations," Kim Yong Sun, a top North Korean policymaker, told the North's official Korean Central News Agency.

"The north and the south must promote coexistence, co-prosperity, common interests, mutual collaboration and unity between fellow countrymen," Kim was quoted as saying.

Kim, regarded as a close confidant of leader Kim Jong Il, spelled out the North's new position in a report to a meeting Wednesday of the country's major political parties and organizations, the North Korean news agency said.

In South Korea, President-elect Kim Dae-jung's party, the National Congress for New Politics, welcomed the North Korean move, calling it "a sign of change in the North's attitude."

Accusations cloud power plant's future

LAWSUIT: Electric station charged with polluting air near Grand Canyon

By Michelle Rushlo
The Associated Press

PHOENIX – The Mohave Generating Station produces electricity for millions of homes in the Southwest, but a conservation group says the plant also produces tons of pollution that clouds the view of the Grand Canyon and violates federal regulations.

The Grand Canyon Trust sued the operators of the plant, which include utility companies in California, Nevada and Arizona, asking a Las Vegas federal court to make them clean up the plant.

"This plant sits there and operates year after year dumping 40,000 tons of pollution into the air. They should join the rest of the U.S. We started to clean up our cars 25 years ago. That plant is being operated exactly as it was in 1973," said Rick Moore, air quality program manager for the Flagstaff, Ariz.-based trust.

The Mohave Generating Station, which is located along the Colorado River in Laughlin, Nev., is the largest uncontrolled source of sulfur dioxide in the Southwest. Sulfur dioxide, while invisible when emitted, joins other chemicals in the air to create sulfates.

Sulfates are blown 60 miles west to the Grand Canyon in the summer, obstructing the view of the canyon, said Carl Bowman, the air quality coordinator for Grand Canyon National Park.

He said the Environmental Protection Agency is still trying to figure how much Mohave affects the greyish blue shroud over the park, but the plant is the largest single contributor to the problem.

The operators of the plant, however, contend Mohave does not have a visible effect on the canyon.

Nader Monsour, environmental regulation manager for Southern California Edison, the chief operator of the plant, said Mohave is in compliance with the Clean Air Act.

He said the plant, which supplies power to about 1.7 million homes, does not significantly affect the environment. All the power plants in the area combined reduce the canyon visibility by 6 percent, Monsour said, and it takes a 10 percent change before it is visible to the naked eye.

Besides, operators argue that it could cost $200 million to clean up the generating station.

Monsour said the plant can probably continue to make a profit even when electricity competition is introduced, but being forced to retrofit the plant with scrubbers or otherwise clean up the plant could push the production cost up 30 or 40 percent, he said.

It could mean the plant would have to close, Monsour said.

That has the Navajo Nation and the Hopi Tribe concerned. They produce the coal slurry that is pipelined 275 miles to the generating station, and both tribes earn a large portion of their revenue from the coal.

For the Navajo Nation, about 15 percent of its general fund money comes directly from the Mohave plant. It also provides about 350 jobs on the reservation.

Ray Baldwin Louis, a spokesman for the Navajo Council, said the tribe is very concerned about the effect the lawsuit might have on the generating station.

"I don't think those issues with environmental impact is that significant for the Navajo Nation. We don't buy that it's affecting our environment, but the revenues that do come into the nation will be greatly affected (if the plant is closed)," he said.

WORLD & NATION BRIEFS

Death row dog gets second chance at life

KANAB, Utah – Spared from death row in Oregon, Nadas the dog frolicked Thursday in his new animal sanctuary home, where he charmed his handlers and looked like anything but a hardened, horse-chasing criminal.

The rambunctious collie-malamute mix had been sentenced to die in 1996 for chasing a neighbor's horse, violating an Oregon law that makes it a capital crime for dogs that kill, injure or even chase livestock.

A groundswell of support from around the world prompted officials in Medford, Ore., last week to commute the death sentence if Nadas would be neutered and sent to an out-of-state sanctuary for the rest of his life.

After a 17-hour flight to Las Vegas and a 3 1/2 hour drive in the back seat of a sport utility vehicle, Nadas arrived before dawn Thursday at the Best Friends Animal Sanctuary. The 200-acre preserve is home to some 1,500 dogs, cats, birds, horses, rabbits and other livestock.

Rescue of beached whales delayed

HOBART, Australia – Strong waves stalled attempts Thursday to rescue 35 sperm whales stranded on a beach in Australia.

The pod is the second in less than three weeks to get stuck on the island state of Tasmania.

The whales beached themselves at Marrawah, on the northwestern tip of Tasmania, state parks and wildlife service biologist Hans Wapstra said.

High seas, whipped by winds gusting above 50 knots, made the attempt too hazardous Thursday night, rangers said.

Rangers will try to keep the whales comfortable on the beach overnight in hopes a rescue operation can be mounted today, Coles said.

Earlier this month, 65 sperm whales were stranded at Ocean Beach, midway down Tasmania's west coast. Only three of them survived after a huge rescue effort lasting several days.

Cosmonauts return home from Mir station

MOSCOW – Two Russian cosmonauts and a French astronaut left Mir and touched down in the snow-covered plains of Central Asia today, wrapping up a successful mission on the 12th anniversary of the space station's launch.

Cosmonauts Anatoly Solovyov and Pavel Vinogradov and Frenchman Leopold Eyharts landed shortly after noon in the empty steppe of central Kazakstan, officials at Mission Control said. It took the crew three hours to descend from the Mir, 250 miles above Earth.

All went well, though space officials were worried beforehand about a blizzard that raged through the republic through early today. The weather improved shortly before the landing.

The two Russians arrived on Mir last August when the troubled space station was hobbled by a number of breakdowns, including a reduced power supply.

But Solovyov and Vinogradov performed several successful repair missions. The station is now back at close to full power and has not had any major problems in recent months.

Mir was launched on Feb. 19, 1986, and was expected to remain in operation for only five years. A series of near disasters last year, including a fire, computer breakdowns and a collision with a cargo ship, raised doubts about Mir's safety.

But Russian space officials want to keep the spacecraft manned at least until next year, when a new international space station is put aloft.

Russians Talgat Musabayev and Nikolai Budarin and American Andrew Thomas remain aboard Mir.

Officials don't evict camping protesters

ENVIRONMENT: Demonstrators try to stop soil tests at site of proposed nuclear waste dump

By Larry Gerber
The Associated Press

NEEDLES, Calif. – Federal rangers made no move Thursday to evict dozens of American Indians and environmentalists from a desert camp where they are protesting the proposed Ward Valley nuclear waste dump.

Although rangers in white vans kept watch from a mile away, the threat of evictions and mass arrests was put on hold indefinitely as officials of the federal Bureau of Land Management (BLM) talked with protest leaders in hopes of reaching a peaceful solution to the week-old demonstration.

"We're still negotiating with the tribe and as long as those negotiations continue there will be no significant law enforcement action," BLM spokeswoman Carole Levitzky said.

The BLM gave eviction notice to the campers on Feb. 13, a day after the latest in a long series of demonstrators arrived.

There have been as few as 20 and as many as 100 people at the camp-in 22 miles west of Needles, which is aimed at blocking soil tests on the site of the proposed dump.

On Wednesday night, as federal visitors looked on, Barbara Antone poked a sharp stick into the ground beside a campfire, took two seeds out of a cloth bag and buried them in the hole.

She was making a point: To her Quechan people, the seeds represent man and woman, sacred symbols of creation.

With her palm, she tamped the Indian corn kernels into the desert dirt at the feet of Ed Hastey, California head of the BLM.

"That's where they will grow," she said.

Hastey and a handful of colleagues made a brief appearance at the camp, where at least a token encampment has been in place since 1996.

Hastey told tribal elders that he was surprised at their invitation and said he would keep talking with officials in Washington in hopes of working out a peaceful solution.

"That's all I can guarantee you," he said.

The dump site is on federal land that would be turned over to the state. Gov. Pete Wilson's administration has licensed dump operators to accept low-level waste from hospitals, laboratories and nuclear plants to be buried in unlined trenches.

Opponents worry that radioactivity could seep into the water table and contaminate the Colorado River, 20 miles east.

An alliance of five American Indian tribes from California and Arizona also say the dump would desecrate their homeland.

The federal government has hesitated to sign over the land to the state government because of safety concerns. Federal experts want to use radioactive tritium to test the soil and say the encampment must be moved.

On Wednesday night, a half-dozen old women kept vigil around the campfire. Younger Indians patrolled the camp.

"We will remain until we find out what's going to happen," said Barbara Antone's husband, Wally Antone.

The campers said they would refuse to leave unless they are forced out in handcuffs.

BUSES

Students are also complaining about the cramped seating these buses provide.

"While they are more comfortable than the older buses, they hold fewer people and when it gets crowded, they are more uncomfortable," said Khalisha Banks, a third-year political science student.

Despite these complaints, UCLA Transportation Services has received compliments for the lessened environmental impact of these buses.

"We have received very positive, environmental-type comments. I have heard a lot of comments in reference to the clean-burning fuel, in that there is no longer a diesel smell," said Lewis.

Among the benefits these buses provide are low emissions caused by clean-burning fuel and reduced operating costs.

While no statistics are available to determine the reduction in emissions, comparable bus lines state that a fleet this size reduces pollutant emission by approximately 1,500 pounds per year.

"We're very proud to have a fleet of environmentally friendly and clean-burning vehicles here," Lewis said.

"We feel that's our contribution to UCLA, this is our environment and our community, and we feel it's our responsibility to do that," she said.

TROOPS

had arrived, with several thousand more expected from Georgia over the next week.

The United States already has tanks, artillery and missile launchers outside the Kuwaiti capital, as part of a defense agreement signed after the Gulf War.

The troops will train like normal, firing weapons, maneuvering in the desert and keeping trucks, computers and radios working. But this training mission came up on just a few days notice and is for an indefinite period.

As part of their regular training, they are equipped with masks and protection from chemical and biological weapons.

"You've got to think about that. That's all they talk about," said Jason Christensen, 20, a computer and night-vision goggles technician from Irvine, Calif. "Right now, we're just training, so if anything happens we'll be prepared."

Many of them have trained in deserts before – either in Egypt or California – but most were in for a new experience in new terrain.

"Until you're here, you've never seen anything like this in your life," said First Lt. Deshawn Brown, 25, who came from her base at Fort Hood, Texas, six weeks ago. "You see camels, you see sheep when you're driving down the road."

Brown, originally from Hemingway, S.C., said she feels she is here to help protect Kuwaitis from a dangerous Hussein.

"I can't even imagine how these people felt in 1991, when someone came over the border and just took their country," she said. "He is a man with nothing to lose, that's my only concern."

Specialist Robert Huffman, a 30-year-old mechanic who was sent to Saudi Arabia during the Persian Gulf War, said he had advised his younger colleagues to be prepared for chemical attacks.

SATURDAY
FEBRUARY 21, 1998
9AM - 5PM

DOORS OPEN AT 8:15
NO REGISTRATION

FOWLER MUSEUM,
LENART AUDITORIUM.

Presented by the UCLA Center for the Physics & Chemistry of the Planets, a research and education unit of the Institute for Geophysics and Planetary Physics.

This one day non-specialist talk is given by a group of world class research scientists who will present and discuss the most up to date knwoledge and understanding we now have about planets and planetary systems. From the inner processes that result in surface earthquakes and mountain building process, to the outer processes that result in Ice Ages and meteorite impacts. Exciting results from the recent Mars-Pathfinder Mission will also be presented.

This series is designed for the general public, public officials, high school and college students, teachers and UCLA Faculty, staff and students of all disciplines.

9:00 am: The Earth as a Dynamic System. Thomas H. Jordan MIT.

9:40 am: Mountain Building: Its Effects on Climatic Change. T. Mark Harrison, UCLA.

10:20 am: Earth's Ice Ages, Chaos Theory and What They Tell Us About

11:00 am: Can We Predict Earthquakes? Leon Knopoff, UCLA.

1:30 pm: The Origin of Earth and Planets. George Wetherill, Carnegie Institute.

2:10 pm: The Core Dynamics of Plantary Magnetic Field. Gary Glatzmaier, Los Alamos National Lab.

2:50 pm: Meteor Impacts and their Role in Shaping Planetary Evolution. Thomas J. Ahrens, CalTech.

Lies and cover-ups:
it is never too early to learn

Student leaders have a lot of experience using rhetoric to cloud issues, shift attention away from themselves

A few quarters ago, one of my artsy-fartsy North Campus-type classes was, for reasons beyond my grasp, conducted in a decidedly humanities-unfriendly classroom somewhere in the bowels of Young Hall – home to UCLA's department of chemistry. If memory serves, the class was a seminar on Goethe, Carew, Proust, Nabokov and Donne titled "Surname Mayhem," but that's not important. The most challenging aspect of the seminar was getting there and back alive. I would navigate through a labyrinth of seedy corridors where upon each door was plastered a warning of the imminent risk and mortal danger to which one entering would be automatically exposed. Passing that rare open door, I would see a lone, nutty professor-type trying to turn the pages of his lab notebook while wearing armpit-length oven mitts, guzzling some smoking, foul-looking solution straight from the beaker or just lying unconscious on the floor. As I wended my way down and back and forth for 10 weeks through that hellish complex, two thoughts were constantly in my mind: a) I didn't belong there, and b) a bunch of teenagers did.

Michael Daugherty

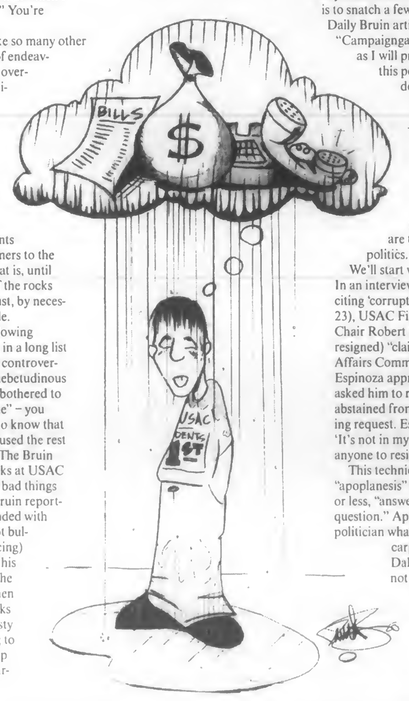
And so it goes in the little big league or big little league (depending on your perspective) that is higher education. We're not there yet. But we will be. Chemistry students will go on to be chemists, engineering students will go on to be engineers, and we English students will fantasize on finding Hemingway's missing valise at one of the garage sales we frequent in search of a foxed and buckled but legible copy of the OED.

Meanwhile, we will continue to be responsible for dipping slices of frozen potato into vats of boiling oil for an adventurous clientele that prefers dining behind the wheel of a moving vehicle.

And what about our "student leaders" (an oxymoron if I've ever seen one)? Will the student politicians at USAC go on to become officials at some other acronym? It seems, based on what I've read lately, that they are certainly well qualified for positions in government. The "Career Objective" line of their collective resume would put a smile of Huey Long's corpse and reads like a Kenneth Starr wet dream: "I deny ever taking part in violating campaign regulations, obfuscating, making blanket denials, slinging mud, avoiding the issue, self-aggrandizing, character assassinating, lying through my teeth, making reprisals, and taking credit for that which I have played no part." You're hired!

Good news: Unlike so many other (more noble) fields of endeavor suffering from an overabundance of new initiates and a dearth of positions for them to fill, politics is (and will always be) ripe for the taking. In fact, there will never be a shortage of positions, postings, appointments and seats for newcomers to the elective sciences – that is, until the Earth runs out of the rocks under which they must, by necessity, retreat and reside.

If you've been following USAC's most recent in a long list of shortcomings and controversies – the one some hebetudinous wannabe pundit has bothered to name "Campaigngate" – you have been bothered to know that one guy quit and accused the rest of doing bad things. The Bruin reported it. Some folks at USAC responded by saying bad things about the guy. The Bruin reported it. The guy responded with some convincing (not bulletproof, but convincing) evidence supporting his initial accusations. The Bruin reported it. Then one of the USAC folks got all mad at the nasty Bruin for attempting to keep its readership up to speed on the smearfest.



Before I go any further, I should, in fairness, admit (unabashedly) that I don't know very much about USAC or Students First!. I don't know who they are, and I don't know what they do. But then, I have no idea what effect niacin or thiamin has on my metabolism; maybe I should. Kendra Fox-Davis, paid USAC functionary, wrote that our current Students First! mutation of USAC has affected programs that "benefit all students." As I am loathe to be an ungrateful beneficiary of others' good works, please, someone, let me know what USAC has done for me so I can express my gratitude. I must have been absent on the day that the Campus Guide to Student Government was distributed. I must have missed the lecture on USAC's influence on my education. Am I the only one? I'll bet dollars to doughnuts that 99 percent of the people who read this don't know enough about USAC to tell you what the letters U-S-A-C stand for. Side note: I've come up with some amusing alternatives. Until now, it had never occurred to me how many unkind words start with the letter "C." I digress.

So, I don't know jack about USAC or Students First!; but being an English major and all, I have developed a fairly sensitive ear to malarkey. There's this really neat book I have called "A Handbook of Rhetorical Terms" by Richard Lanham, a professor of English at UCLA. It's not exactly bathroom reading, unless, I suppose, you have a dying need to know the meaning of "amphidiorthosis" while you are indisposed for reasons of a personal nature. It's a useful aid in giving a proper name to some common rhetorical techniques we more generally refer to as "B.S." My intent here is to snatch a few quotes from recent Daily Bruin articles on "Campaigngate" (or "Weaselgate" as I will prefer to call it from this point forward), to demonstrate the rhetorical spilth that emanates from some members of our student government. By this measure, we will be well served in assessing how ready they are to enter big-league politics.

We'll start with Max Espinoza. In an interview ("Chair resigns, citing 'corrupt' government," Jan. 23), USAC Finance Committee Chair Robert Rhoan (the guy who resigned) "claims that Academic Affairs Commissioner Max Espinoza approached him and asked him to resign after Rhoan abstained from voting on a funding request. Espinoza denied this. 'It's not in my authority to ask anyone to resign,' he said."

This technique is called "apoplanesis" which means, more or less, "answering a different question." Apoplanesis is to a politician what a hammer is to a carpenter. Jeffrey Dahmer could say "It's not in my authority to eat people." True statement. But whether or not he did is a different question. Did Espinoza ask Rhoan to resign? In computer science they'd say this question has a binary solution set; the answer is one of two things: "Yes" or "No." The bottom line is: somebody's telling a fib. What nice company they keep.

Here's another one: Fox-Davis, in response to Rhoan's accusations, said, "I am personally disturbed by his allegations because he has never indicated to our council that he has had any concerns regarding the authenticity of our expense accounts."

This is called "peristrophe," which means "converting an opponent's argument to one's own use." She's basically saying that she's bothered by the accusations because he didn't mention them sooner. Should we infer that she would not have been "personally disturbed" if he had mentioned the accusations immediately? She apparently wants us to think that because he waited, his accusations are therefore somehow less valid. Rhoan ends up getting beaten over the head by his own cudgel. Tricky stuff and a mainstay of modern political rhetoric.

I have saved the best for last. In her letter to the Daily Bruin ("Time to investigate the investigators," Feb. 17), Fox-Davis poorly projects an "argumentum ad misericordiam" (an appeal to the mercy of the hearers) on behalf of Daily Bruin contributing reporter Dennis Lim. She seems to apologize for the fact that some Bruin reporters have no "formal journalistic training beyond writing for a high-school paper." And what formal training, might I ask, does Fox-Davis have for being "chief of staff"? (Now I'm the one using peristrophe.) She mentions twice in 14 words that Lim is a "freshman" (isn't that word sexist and out of vogue?), thereby insinuating a lack of ability on his part. She says that whatever "prompted" the "attack" on Students First! "does not really matter." If so, why does she spend over 150 words hypothesizing on the issue? She attributes the parts of his reportage she doesn't like to his eagerness, stress, scrambling and a "desire for the spotlight."

Lanham might call this "indignatio" (arousing the audience's scorn) or "argumentum ad hominem" (disparaging one's opponent's character), but let's skip the frou-frou Latinate labels and describe it in terms we all know: it's arrogant, it's condescending and it obscures the real issues.

If Fox-Davis knows what goes on America: Melting pot or salad bowl? Many analogies have been used to explain the interaction among America's myriad ethnic/racial groups. The goal of integrating into the mainstream is often tempered by a desire to maintain ethnic/racial uniqueness. This tension can precipitate the call for nationalisms. Can nationalisms peacefully co-exist in America, or are they mutually exclusive? Is patriotism really just "loving America or leaving it?"

AMERICA: Giving every person special freedoms makes country unique

By Daniel Rego

America. That word means so much to me. I believe in America and what it, above all other countries, stands for: the sovereignty and freedom of the individual. But there are those who call this country AmeriKKKa and this state KKKalifornia. They call me a devil, oppressor and murderer. They do not know the true essence of America.

This article is about that true essence.

America is not a nation of any particular ethnic group. But some may attempt to fool you into thinking that this is a country of W.A.S.P.'s (White Anglo-Saxon Protestants), and that everyone else is fooled, oppressed or a sell-out. I am not a W.A.S.P. I am not sell-out, I just believe in freedom. Those who viciously shout otherwise are most sincerely wrong.

These individuals think only in the myopic view of racial classifications. America is not a land of racial classifications. This may be why some hate it so much. This country is not a country of race, but of an idea – that of freedom and the right to pursue happiness, and to this end, the freedoms of life, liberty and property.

America is not a country of socialism, for socialism is anathema to freedom. Many of those who cry "evil AmeriKKKa" believe in racial classification and delude others into following Nazi-esque patterns of racial rigidity. The racial whole does not delegate rights to individuals, but individuals delegate power to the government. Rights do not vary from race to race, ethnicity to ethnicity – freedom is an invariable thing.

We are all sovereign individuals who delegate some of our sovereignty to both the federal government and to California. These are created to protect our inherent rights. Bearing that protection, we reserve the right to deal freely with others. That means that we work through mutual agreement with others. That is freedom; that is America. I believe in my freedom, and I believe in America.

The problem that some have with this idea is that they view life

Race: blurred beyond recognition

ENCLAVES: Grouping by race does not assure any sense of belonging

By Catie Bailard

Ethnic enclaves, hmmm ... you're kidding, right? Should the United States be divided into ethnic enclaves? That is the question, right? Wow, are you sure this isn't the show platform for a future Jerry Springer 60-minute tirade of ignorance and idiocy? In fact, I seem to remember a Jerry episode that touched on this proposal. It was something along the lines of "Klanfrontation! When Racists Attack: Part 4!"

OK, maybe I'm wrong. But you are catching my drift, yes? Now where should I begin with my own tirade? Let's start with the enclave part. No, we'll get back to that; let's start with what the Einsteins who support this solution most likely believe the problem is: racial pride, racial exclusion, and to sum it up – race. Not their own of course, but all those other pesky races that incessantly rear their multi-pigmented heads. All right, I have to admit that when the kids sitting next to me in lecture were drawing the flag of their country of origin on their body parts, followed by nationalistic slogans, I found myself growing a little perturbed. But you know what I did? This is revolutionary: I stopped myself, and I took a long look into the darker corners of my mind. You know the ones, where all those little, not-so-enlightened nuances skulk around in trench coats. And then I opened a window, and let me tell you ... the sunlight was refreshing.

Boo hoo, my feelings are hurt ... they're in America, goddamnit. You know, America the beautiful, the melting pot and all that jazz. Hey, if they don't love it why don't they leave? Well, if they won't leave let's just divide up the country so we don't have to listen to all that cultural crap. I just hate feeling left out. So you stay on your side of the line and I will stay on mine.

But the truth is, one of the few things I think America, Land of Hypocrites, has going for it is our unique mix of races and cultures. Often I have looked around my lectures and enjoyed the ethnic diversity of the students sitting around me. Where else in the in the world can you have the privilege of savoring the disparate beauties of so many different ethnicities in a space as small as a single lecture hall? How many countries can boast such a diversified list of well known authors including Toni Morrison, Amy Tan, Kate Chopin, Sandra Cisneros, Leslie Marmon Silko and John Steinbeck? Personally, I have taken a quasi-Aristotelian approach in my examination of various cultures, and there is not a single culture that I do not believe could teach me something of value.

Don't get me wrong. I am not asserting that the racial atmosphere in the United States is picture perfect and tension-free. We all know this is far from the truth. The fact is that separatists, zealots and paranoids aren't racially exclusive. This is a human vice, not a racial one. In fact, anyone who has taken Anthropology 7 knows that the concept of race cannot be genetically identified. Each race has within it such diversity it is impossible to find a DNA standard from which to categorize races. Race is cultural; race is how you were raised. I don't know about you, but I know that culturally, I identify myself more closely with my American-raised Colombian roommate than I do with the Australian who lived downstairs, or than I do with the pig farmers I visited in Nebraska. So if you go with that whole ethnic enclave plan, I would really like to know where you are planning to put me.

The fact is, if you feel like getting back to your roots and enjoying the company of your own culture, you're in luck. There are places each of you can go. But the great part about this country is that if you feel like delving into a culture other than your own, you can do that too. You can take an Asian-American history class, attend a reggae festival, go to a powwow, watch a gay and lesbian pride parade, study Buddhism, visit a Cinco de Mayo celebration, and you can always attend a Phish concert to name just a few ways.

The beautiful part is that we are pretty much free to expose ourselves to as many, or as few of these various expressions of culture as we want. Sure, there may be a few people who give you dirty looks to bring attention to the fact that you're on their turf, but there will also be many who do not, and there will also be those who appreciate your attendance and interest.

only through the concept of racial diversity classifications, forgetting that individuals are diverse. Racial classifications are only words. America stands for the diversity of the individual. These views of "nationalism" are absurd. It assumes that individuals are nothing more then representatives of a racial stereotype. "Peoples" are not sovereign, but are only a artificial classification thrust on others. One is an American by choice. One does not claim a homeland by race or ethnicity but by truly being a part of that home.

Patriotism in America is about the love of freedom. Nationalism is of racial division and necessarily racism, for separate is inherently unequal.

When did I become a patriot? Quite simply, I visited another country and saw the alternative. This was not a "third-world" country or a developing nation. This country was England (that place filled with "Anglos").

There, I saw the insanity of socialism, in ways both subtle and glaring. It was then that I realized freedoms that are sacred here are trounced upon in the name of socialism and "the people;" it was then that I realized what America really stands for. True, the people running it have not always shared this view and have often worked against it, but this country and what it stands for cannot be sullied by evil men who may run it.

I am a patriot. I love my freedom. I love my sovereignty. I am not a nationalist – I do not believe in race. In virtually any other country, never has the individual been placed over the alleged collective whole (usually demagogues and proto-bureaucrats controlling people).

I am an individual. Because I realize that this country stands for freedom – my freedom and everyone's freedom – I salute the flag of both America and of California. Because of this, I work to make this country and state more free from the hands of tyranny. I am a patriot – always – for freedom.

in Lim's mind, she must be clairvoyant. Well then, let's ask her to peer into her scry and tell us who made all those telephone calls on our dime? (She steers far clear of that issue in her letter.) Let's ask her why random students received campaign calls from Students First!? Let's ask her why the "second invoice" looks like it's been fussed with? (See for yourself. The invoices are posted in the Bruin Archives web page.) What a pity that someone's need to cover her fellow Students First! pals would supersede their obligation to the people who put her there in the first place.

The fact that she is willing to disparage an earnest, hard working (unpaid, I might add) reporter to suit the needs of her party is further testament to her suitability for future employment in the offices of other self-serving public servants. I could go on for days with other examples, but I think we get the point. Perhaps they should start calling themselves Student Leaders First!

For what it's worth, I have scoured all the articles associated with Weaselgate (the scandal formerly known as "Campaigngate"), and as far as I can tell, the Daily Bruin's news department didn't go outside of the nominal bounds of journalist integrity. Lest you think my opinion on the matter is invalid because I am a Daily Bruin Viewpoint columnist, let me assure you otherwise: I have written against The Bruin before and I wouldn't hesitate to do it again if I saw any such indiscretion or opportunity.

I know you're very busy, but if any of this interests you at all, go to The Bruin's web page and read the articles yourself. Then read Fox-Davis's letter. Find the contradictions, suss out the manipulative phrases, cheese-ball rhetorical trickery and innuendo. It's kinda' slick, in a sophomoric kinda' way. See for yourself how our student leadership scurries around damning allegations.

In closing, you might be asking where I get off disparaging our fine young crop of student leaders and their entourage. I'll tell you where. Right here. Right here in The Bruin. Love it or hate it, it's the community voice of this campus. It's exceptionally accessible to anyone in our community who has a point to make and needs a place to make it. It may be just a throwaway, but it's our throwaway.

Perhaps, I have been naive in thinking that all the evil crud associated with politics doesn't happen until the stakes get a lot higher. I stand corrected. Maybe that odd stench wasn't coming from Young Hall after all.

BAILARD

So what if there are people who are proud of their own cultures; why shouldn't they be? There is beauty in every culture, just as every culture has a few of its own skeleton-filled closets. As long as you are not being attacked, why feel threatened? Do you seriously believe that defining more lines and drawing more boundaries will really improve race relations in this country? Wasn't that the pretext that fueled the government's original treaties with the Native Americans which called for the creation of an "Indian Country" where all those "pesky, dangerous" natives could be segregated from the settlers? It may interest you to know that these treaties failed miserably, and when they did fail, the United States embarked on a brutal military campaign of genocide and forced removal. This was in the interest of preserving the peace, of course!

Ethnic enclaves already exist in America, and if you're interested in living in one, be my guest. I understand that there are many who feel more comfortable living in an area where they are surrounded by their own culture, and to others it may seem natural, and yet to others it is a matter of where they ended up. There is nothing wrong with this, if this is your choice. But I implore you not to make these choices for everyone else. It might be shocking, but not everyone may feel the same way as you.

If you are really afraid of being offended, of not being accepted by everyone you meet, or if you are angered that not everyone around you looks and acts just like you, by all means take refuge in an enclave of your associates. But much to your dismay, I assure you that this enclave will not consist of a single skin color or a single culture. It will be a conglomerate of narrow-minded, ethnocentric, suspicious, ignorant souls whose skin may not look like yours, but whose neuroses do.

And seriously, if this ethnic enclave thing ever does come about do you really think you'll have an easy time finding a decent burrito, or udon for that matter, or fried rice or linguine? And don't forget those falafels, and I do love fry bread. Do you really want to get up in the morning and not have an English muffin? C'mon, are you really willing to risk that?

ARTS & ENTERTAINMENT

UCLA Center for the Performing Arts

Leon Bates will perform at UCLA's Schoenberg Hall on Saturday.

PUMPING IVORY

Leon Bates applies concentration and stamina to his careers as both a pianist and a bodybuilder

By Sam Toussi
Daily Bruin Contributor

When someone talks to concert pianist Leon Bates, the question invariably is asked: How much do you bench?

Now why would anyone want to embarrass a guy like that? Why would anyone want to prove that all concert pianists are scrawny, sickly little people who spent their entire childhood indoors?

So how much does he bench?

"Three-twenty," Bates says.

No, really, how much do you bench?

"Really, I bench three hundred and twenty pounds," Bates chuckles.

Perhaps it would be fair to put Bates in a group of his own: a concert pianist who is also a bodybuilder. This combination may evoke memories of that 'Saturday Night Live' mock commercial: "It's a dessert topping. It's a floor wax. No, wait, it's both!" But to Bates the different facets of his life are not as irreconcilable as they first seem.

On Saturday and Monday, Bates will show UCLA how he manages to play like Helfgott and look like the Hulk. On Saturday, he will perform works by Romantic composers such as Chopin and RachmaninoffT. Then, on Monday, he will give a demonstration on the parallels between bodybuilding and piano playing.

Raised in Germantown, Penn., Bates divided his time between playing sports with his friends and piano, violin and tuba lessons. In high school, he spent hours pumping iron at a local gym, all while playing in numerous concerts.

Today, Bates plays with prestigious groups such as the New York Philharmonic Orchestra. And while some may view Bates as unconventional because he works out two hours a day, six days a week, Bates just looks at his regimen as part of who he is.

"It was easy for me to come to bodybuilding because of my participation in sports," Bates says. "I grew up in what you say was a pretty average, middle-class upbringing and I grew up playing like any other kid in the neighborhood. It was just coincidental that I was also a music enthusiast."

Yet as Bates became more heavily involved with the piano and weights, he began to see parallels between the two and even ways each aspect of his life would benefit the other.

"Both (the piano and bodybuilding) require a great deal of concentration and

Nova Café is stellar getaway

RESTAURANT: Sci-fi look, tasty food contribute to comfortable ambience

By Terry Tang
Daily Bruin Contributor

A steaming cup of espresso. A thick slice of pepperoni pizza. Softly lit candles. A starry landscape.

This is not a meal on the U.S.S. Enterprise. At the Nova Express Café, where space meets spice, the unique galaxy setting surprisingly adds to the coffeehouse atmosphere, complementing the whirring cappuccino maker and the rich aroma of Italian cuisine.

Hidden on North Fairfax Avenue a few blocks away from the Miracle Mile, Nova Express has been on the map for more than five years. However, being outside of Westwood, the café is a well-kept secret which more students should share.

At first glance, Nova Express appears like the typical coffeehouse. But through the door awaits a dark alien ambience. With only fluorescent orange lava lamps hanging from the ceiling and a candle on each table to light the way, the room carries an aura of intimacy, not fright. The corner seats are the best in the seat-yourself restaurant – a couple or even a small group of friends can achieve a sense of privacy in a room full of other guests. Choose the round table if possible.

Similar to a conference table that you would find on the set "Star Trek," this five-seater has cushioned, reclining chairs. What more can you ask for after scarfing down a filling Earthling Sandwich and a double espresso? Also, the table strategically faces the makeshift cosmic scene of stars, random planets and other celestial bodies.

The café enhances its lost-in-space decor with various objects scattered around the room. A toy robot perches on the coffee bar facing a wall plastered with sci-fi comic book covers from the past. Also, customers can browse through a shelf of used paperbacks of (you guessed it) science fiction and free local papers.

But while the scene may appear alien, the food is not.

Since Nova Express aims to be more of a coffee shop than a restaurant, the service may not be as attentive as a customer may like. Besides self-seating, menus should be picked up from the bar before the waiter's arrival at the table. Since the café spans one room, the same waiter serves everyone. Once the order has been served, it is up to the customer to ask for anything extra or ask for the bill.

Aside from the usual coffee beverages, biscotti and cookies, Nova Express serves an array of Italian food from "cosmic pizzas" to "celestial" salads and sandwiches. The café provides a much wider variety than many other coffee joints.

Appetizers range from chips and salsa to Waffles Fiesta – topped with fresh fruit and whipped cream and syrup. However, a very savory snack is the empanada ($2.25). These petite Argentinean pocket pies – the only non-Italian food on the menu – come with beef or spinach fillings. Piping hot, the seasoned beef snacks are a flavorful treat. However, considering its palm-size, one empanada does not seem like enough for the price tag.

Anyone who even mildly enjoys eating pizza should sample a slice of the cosmic pizza combinations. The pizza menu ($1.95 to $3.50) emphasizes fresh ingredients, a made-from-scratch dough and the café's special tomato sauce. Instead of ordering one of The Classics (cheese, pepperoni and sausage), order the Light Ship ($2.75 per slice). Besides being one of several vegetarian choices, this entree is crisp and wholesome. A homemade crust with freshly sliced tomatoes and basil, the pizza is both healthy and hearty. Although the crust is a bit on the crunchy side, it mixes with the sweet tomato sauce. One slice of Nova's pizza can go a long way in satisfying an appetite. The chef is very generous with portions and toppings.

Another list of entrees to choose from are the "Nutrinos" Earthling Sandwiches ($3.35 to $6.35) which come with either a green salad or chips and salsa. Mostly hot items, the choices vary from ham and melted mozzarella to turkey and avocado. However, the roasted eggplant with mozzarella leaves much to be desired. Even vegetarians may not enjoy this delicacy. In spite of the fresh Nova bread and steaming, stringy cheese, the eggplant is bland without any real flavor.

As for the beverages, a lot of choices are available to cover different cravings. In the mood for a hot beverage? The espresso bar offers single and dou-

"I Love You ... Don't Touch Me!"
Directed by Julie Davis
Starring Marla Schaffel, Mitchell Whitfield and Michael Harris

Great, another movie devoted to sex, sex and more sex. You're probably thinking "Indecent Proposal," "Boogie Nights" or "Threesome." But wait! Try a movie about, of all things, virginity – the long and agonizing road of being a 25-year-old virgin in the '90s.

It explains the film's unusual, but profoundly catchy title. "I Love You ... Don't Touch Me!" is a comedy about Katie (Schaffel), a young woman searching for her romantic ideal in the Los Angeles singles scene. Meanwhile, her best friend Ben (Whitfield), who is openly in love with her, must stand by and watch her fall for jerk after jerk. When she finally does think she's met Mr. Perfect (Harris), she realizes that Mr. Perfect doesn't necessarily mean Mr.Right.

Throughout the movie, friends and family inundate her with unwanted advice about giving in to her sexual desires and giving up her ideals.

"I Love You" is great at examining the life of an independent '90s woman who deals with the complex issues of sex every day. Especially since it seems like everyone is doing it, except for her.

It also has some interesting dialogue with a number of memorable lines. For instance, in one scene when Katie is about to engage in casual sex, she stops and asks her apathetic partner, "Didn't your mother ever tell you, you are what you eat?"

Great premise, great story, great dialogue ... now if only Schaffel wasn't so darn unlikable. Although she does a somewhat adequate job in acting, she fails to establish the necessary connection with the audience to make them truly care about her character. Some of the dialogue, clever as it is, just doesn't seem right coming out of her mouth. And even to the untrained ear, in scenes when Schaffel, a veteran of Broadway musicals, must sing in a nightclub, there's nothing you can do but squirm in artistic (maybe even physical, mental and psychological) pain.

But if you can get beyond Schaffel's mediocre performance, it's a great movie, well worth seeing. Too bad she's in every scene of the movie.

Marla Schaffel and Michael Harris star in "I Love You ... Don't Touch Me!"

"Senseless"
Directed by Penelope Spheeris
Starring Marlon Wayans, David Spade and Matthew Lillard

At least the name of the movie is appropriate. After watching this new "comedy," moviegoers may be wondering how sensible the filmmakers and actors were when they decided to sign on to this lame-o film.

Wayans stars as Darryl Witherspoon, a dirt-poor business student who agrees to be a test subject for a radical scientific experiment that will affect his senses of touch, taste, smell, sight and hearing.

Soon, Darryl is realizing that his new supersenses have some advantages. He can ogle a girl's butt from a block away, he can hear conversations from across a room, he can read a newspaper from a mile away. Like all ambitious students would, Darryl takes advantage of these supernatural powers to cheat his way to a great job on Wall Street. So when he gets a little too dependent on the new drug and takes more than his usual dosage, his senses go out of control and wackiness ensues.

While the story is ridiculous, the jokes are gross and not funny. This comedy does have two things going for it though: some really cute actors. No, I'm not talking about Spade, that snide and overrated little bug who "very realistically" plays the Big-Man-On-Campus frat boy. No, the two young hotties in this movie are Wayans, the youngest and certainly the most attractive of his many brothers, and Matthew Lillard (the nutbar in "Scream") as his adorable multi-pierced roommate who mistakes Darryl's erratic behavior for heroin abuse. The friendship scenes between these two actors are the only bearable ones.

Yet, despite their charm, the movie's insipid plot and tired jokes have sealed the movie's fate as a cheap video rental in a couple of years. But Wayans and Lillard are too good for this.

Director Spheeris, who did such a wonderfully clever job with "Wayne's World," is just wasting her considerable talents here in relying so heavily on bathroom jokes and low-brow humor. Do we really need an extended scene of Darryl eavesdropping on a girl having really bad diarrhea? Do we really need to see Darryl trying to lick the chest of a silicone-stuffed bimbo?

In this movie's frequently inane attempts to show the audience how silly it would be to lose one of your senses, the movie itself and why it was even made stand as the best example. It just doesn't make sense.

"Dangerous Beauty"
Directed by Marshall Herskovitz
Starring Catherine McCormack and Rufus Sewell

The title "Dangerous Beauty" sounds more like an NBC "Movie of the Week" than a serious drama about 16th-century Renaissance Venice. To be truthful, if not for the elaborate sets and costumes that permeate the film, it could fit very well in the often shallow and empty world of network television cinema.

Though director Herskovitz obviously has lofty goals for this tale of a non-conformist hooker, the film succeeds in doing little more than being moderately entertaining eye candy.

It is fairly easy to get caught up in the skillfully crafted visuals of the movie, but when it is all over, you'll wonder just what it was you saw while you were in the theater.

"Dangerous Beauty" stars McCormack (best known as Mel Gibson's wife in "Braveheart") as Veronica Franco, a lower-class girl who cannot marry the man she loves (Sewell) because he must marry according to his station.

What's her solution? Why, to become a prostitute or "courtesan" as they were known to Venitians at the time. We learn soon enough that courtesans are provided with more privileges and freedoms than wives during this time period, and therefore were the most educated and artistic women in all of Italy.

At this point, the viewer is forced to wonder just what the filmmakers are trying to tell us. Is it that this barbaric society forced women to be sex slaves in order to acquire knowledge? That would make sense, if the movie wasn't so in love with its setting and all of its characters. It's difficult for the filmmakers to berate Venice when the costume designers and art directors did such a good job of making it look wonderful.

The film's interpretation of Venice is so lavish and decorative that it's very hard to hold the city up to any serious criticism. The characters are all written as the typical charming, well-read Renaissance men, making it hard to hold them in contempt either.

What the audience is left with is the image of this paternalistic society that commits many crimes against women, but is fairly benign in the long run.

Also a detriment to the search for meaning in "Dangerous Beauty" is the film's lack of any sort of antagonist. This leaves the story with no momentum and no real point. We watch for two hours and have no idea what the movie is trying to tell us or what Veronica really wants.

This is not to say it isn't a diversion for a couple of hours. The actors do well enough with the material, and there is some choice dialogue that was obviously fun for the performers to read.

One such an enjoyable scene finds Veronica and a suitor (Oliver Platt) engaging in a grandiose sword fight, in perhaps the best written and photographed scene in the film. If only all of this razzle-dazzle had been focused on making the story go somewhere interesting, instead of its formulaic "Braveheart"-ish ending, "Dangerous Beauty" might have been more than a beautiful movie with absolutely no brain.

Under Tijuana's fun exterior lies world of scary experiences

COLUMN: Mexico trip turns into nights of beer, frightening encounters

Michelle Zubiate

The world in general is a pretty scary place when you're 19 years old, five feet tall and have the face of a child. Tijuana, Mexico? It's hell on earth as far as I'm concerned.

For the most part, my lifetime memories of Mexico (if you can call 10 miles south of the border "Mexico") have been rather pleasant. Those visions of lounging on the white sand beaches of Rosarito, binging on 50-cent tacos and sipping virgin piña coladas invoke nostalgic fantasies while slaving away over lame biology and astronomy textbooks.

Not until I turned 18, legal in Mexico's terms, and had discovered the magic of alcohol did I realize it was time to make that leap into adulthood. Did I dare quench that rebellious nature that I knew had been hiding inside of me?

Pack up dad's minivan, girls. It's the summer after high school graduation and we have a date with booze, babes and bumpin' beats (Ahhh, you like that, huh?).

Little did I know of the dangers that I would have to face the second I arrived in TJ, Baja California.

Our first mission was to find the right club to boogie at all night long. We didn't even consider finding a hotel room in this "city of scum." We weren't that brave. Since we also weren't too keen on the idea of sleeping in the car, we challenged ourselves to party away every minute of our three days and two nights. No problem right?

Well, let me tell you, I did not start this trip off as the party type. I grew up the good little Catholic school girl, devoted to her studies and sheltered from the evils of "those rowdy teenagers." I definitely was not prepared for those inane rituals that "naughty" kids find frequent enjoyment in. Right off, it was obvious we had a long night ahead of us when one of our more "experienced" friends ditched us (ride-less) as she and an unknown local drove away into the night.

At the first club (for future reference, I can't remember a single name of any clubs or people I encountered while there), we found had a huge sign in front that screamed "Foam Fest '97." My friends and I soon learned that bubbles have many uses. Some a little too risque for this column, others we had the pleasure of experiencing first hand. Basically it was a dance party where bubbles, foam and suds are blown at the dance floor through monstrous machines. Although the scene was getting a little frightening and the club's theme a little kinky for my tastes, I soon adapted to my environment, jumped right in, and had a blast dancing and drinking with suds up to my chin.

Stage is this group's playground as it turns in top-notch performance

MUSIC: Opening act Lincoln sets perfect tone for New York-based band

By Vanessa VanderZanden
Daily Bruin Staff

It's as simple as poppies. It's as sweet as sex and candy. It's as innocent as a romp on Marcy Playground.

Wednesday night, the New York-based band, whose single, "Sex and Candy," has topped the modern rock charts for nine weeks now, took its basic beats and rolling rhythms to the Troubadour. The hour-and-a-quarter-long set ran as smoothly as any Los Angeles headlining debut could, the young group performing like seasoned professionals. Only the slick warm-up act, Lincoln, experienced any kind of panic.

The opening musicians alluded to the fact, late in their set, that the guitarist laying down chords wasn't a Lincoln standard. The original player had to drop out of the performance at the eleventh hour, leaving the talented New York band to call on the only Angeleno they knew. Luckily for Lincoln, he just happened to be a guitarist with the capacity to fill in at the sold-out performance.

But the crowd of twentysomething KROQ listeners in sharp leather jackets and relaxed fit jeans would never have been able to tell the difference. Lincoln's lead singer set the mellow mood with his well enunciated, bluesy-twang voice, Krishna-style blouse and shaved head. Going for the L.A. look, he of course accessorized with a pair of sunglasses.

Humbly throwing out praise for Marcy Playground at every chance he could, Lincoln's lead singer offered the perfect warm-up vibe. The band played their steady-paced melodies with as much confidence as the comfortable sounding headliners. Offering uncomplicated tunes at a down-to-earth level, Lincoln provided Marcy Playground with the appropriate lead-in.

By the time singer/songwriter John Wozniak led his bassist and drummer on stage, the calm crowd had packed the floor. To the audience's delight, Marcy Playground started off with their first big radio release, "Poppies." Undaunted by the tremendous amounts of people filling the tight, road house-style club, Wozniak hit every note with tranquil precision.

Almost as though they were playing the songs in their own basement, the casual performers seemed as comfortable in front of a crowd as by themselves. Yet they never appeared oblivious to the presence of the audience, able to shine as a result of their fans' attention. And, though they mostly just kept to their designated space on stage, foregoing any kind of heavy metal superstar antics, Wozniak's self-aware dancing eyes and knowing smiles spoke to the crowd.

Wozniak kept his lyrics coherent at every turn, realizing that the words really do matter. While some bands rely on catchy tunes and unintelligible choruses, much of Marcy Playground's appeal comes in the well-written tales they tell. For instance, who wouldn't want to hear the words to "Vampires of New York," which rattles off, "Or maybe she's already/ dead and maybe she's/ gone to Mars/ Maybe we could even/ write her epitaph in the/ stars."

When this song in particular came on, the crowd went crazy. Wozniak read the audience's whims to include an extended sing-a-long chorus which he abruptly dropped, deciding against it a second later. His ability to play to the audience spoke well of his performing skills.

Wozniak even alluded to an era of dorkiness in an entirely non-self-deprecating way when he introduced "A Cloak of Elvenkind." The performer asked the crowd, "Do we like wood nymphs and lizards and dragons and magic books? Well, I wrote this song when that was all I knew."

In a sharp contrast to this nostalgic childhood piece, the band moved on to its meal card song of the moment, "Sex and Candy." Opening the seductive tune by admitting, "I know you know this one," Wozniak led the half-singing audience through the overplayed radio song with grace and style. Even though the band members must be tired of rehashing the work at every stage performance, they never let on.

However, Wozniak smoothly followed up the familiar tune with a new song, written for his wife. And, though the piece probably had been performed many times in the past, Wozniak seemed to truly feel the lyrics in the performance. Singing "All the nights ... she was all that I needed" after introducing the work saying, "Mad props to the wife," Wozniak appeared to be feeling the toll road life takes on the emotions.

In a moment of spontaneity, Wozniak asked the crowd for requests, and when someone suggested Lynyrd Skynyrd's "Free Bird," he fooled around with the "Sweet Home Alabama" riff. Turning to the bassist with a grin, Wozniak said, "You want to do it?" The response seemed less than intrigued. "You don't want to do it, that just makes me want to," Wozniak proclaimed to the crowd's delight.

Soon, they broke into the down-home-style, hard-rockin' tune. Yet, Wozniak maintained his vocal crispness, playing the piece Playground style. Apparently, this was only the third show the band played the cover, the time in Birmingham being so pumped it made them "feel like wrestlers."

Wozniak offered a goofy, self-knowing wink when he claimed "Secret Squirrel" will be the band's last song, suggesting they just might do an encore. The jamming piece, also a previously unheard song, allowed the group to rock out before leaving the stage. But of course, they came back for two more tunes.

The first of the songs had the drummer smoking a cigarette, not really in defiance of the new non-smoking laws, but more just because he seemed to want one. After all, Marcy Playground is a group of mama's boys, which Wozniak didn't attempt to hide, dedicating the second song to his mom who was somewhere in the crowd. It too was a new work, titled "Teenage Hypochondriac."

Yet, the best part of the show clearly came in the final tune, which had Wozniak singing a cappella into the mic. Sounding like a religious ditty, the sweet, smooth piece showcased Wozniak's amazing singing capacity. He had the crowd repeating the line, "Good night" after him, offering the best closing to a show that many had seen in years.

focus," Bates explains. "The bodybuilding helps with my endurance. Most people don't recognize how physically demanding playing the piano can be, especially in the concert setting. You get tired, you're perspiring and that's when the conditioning really pays off because that's the whole goal of the conditioning."

This may all sound like a gimmick, but Bates insists that it is not. And when he talks about the direct relationship between piano and bodybuilding techniques, it's hard not to see what he's talking about. Suddenly, the incongruity between the body and the soul needed to play the piano disappears.

Critics cite his "power" most often

> "Both (the piano and bodybuilding) require a great deal of concentration."

because Bates looks absolutely enormous in his concert tuxedo. Yet, every critic marvels at the emotional depth that Bates is able to explore. Alicia Anstead of the Bangor Daily News called his performance, "skillful and honest, so elegant and warm." These types of reviews are common for Bates and serve to break down the stereotype that muscle guys are too dense to comprehend the alphabet, let alone the complex Rachmaninoff chords.

But Bates doesn't really care about breaking stereotypes. When he is called "a prominent black pianist" Bates is less than excited.

"I'm flattered," he says. "But to me it's more important to be a good pianist than to be a black pianist. It's about the musical experience for me."

Bates attempts to convey that musical experience in every concert he does. Still, Bates has built a career on surprising audiences and random people at the gym in the same breath.

MUSIC: Leon Bates will perform Saturday at 8 p.m. at Schoenberg Hall. Tickets are $25, $10 with UCLA ID. He will hold a demonstration Monday from 1 p.m. to 2 p.m. at the John Wooden Center. For more information, call (310) 825-2101.

ble shots of the traditional coffee fare – latte, mocha, cappuccino, etc. There are also specialty drinks such as an Italian soda ($2.25), which is carbonated water with a flavored syrup, which add a nice twist. A customer can choose from fruity flavors like blueberry and raspberry or almond and hazelnut. Chocolate mint syrup combined with the carbonation leaves a cool aftertaste.

On the other side of the beverage spectrum, the café also serves fresh fruit smoothies. Choice of fruit includes bananas, strawberries, blueberries, peaches and cantaloupe or a mixture of all five fruits ($3.15 to $3.50). If the strawberry smoothie is any indication, these shakes are good for quenching thirst but the consistency is thin, not creamy. However, the fresh strawberry taste is still apparent. Freshness is one quality upheld throughout the menu.

Desserts are the same conventional goodies served at other coffee places – chocolate cake, cheesecake, carrot cake, biscotti and pre-purchased cookies ($3.25).

For anyone who feels the need to escape the world of Westwood in the dead of night or the wee hours of the morning, especially after a long week of classes, Nova Express Café serves as the ideal spot. With its mouth-watering pizza and cozy nooks and crannies, the cafe makes a great magnet for the college crowd.

SAN DIEGO

Jolla sounds more appealing. The Torrey Pines Glider Port, located across the street from UCSD, gives hang gliding lessons to everyone from first-timers to experts, and presents a spectacular view to wussies who don't want to strap themselves to a big kite.

With all this skydiving and hang gliding, San Diego's culture might seem obsessed with airborne endeavors. Remember, the naval academy Top Gun used to be located at Naval Air Station, Miramar, but it has since moved. Still, Bruins are welcome to visit Kansas City Barbecue, the restaurant where the cast of "Top Gun" sang Jerry Lee Lewis' "Great Balls of Fire" at the piano.

Speaking of movie landmarks, if that tickles your pickle, check out Hotel Del Coronado, the elegant and ultra-classy spot that served as a backdrop for Jack Lemmon, Walter Matthau and Marilyn Monroe in "Some Like It Hot."

Or, if the Del Coronado strikes you as dull, sign up to become a Navy Seal and go through the infamous "Hell Week" training regiment on the other side of Coronado. It might be wise to hit the exer-bike at the Wooden Center for some training beforehand.

More mellow San Diego pursuits include strolling down Prospect Street in La Jolla, watching chubby sea lions lounge at nearby Children's Cove, shopping at downtown's Horton Plaza or checking out Old Town, home of the Whaley House, the country's "most haunted house" according to some federal landmark agency. Animal lovers can find a turtle farm in Jamul, a parrot ranch in Mt. Helix and plenty of fish and sea life at the Stephen Birch Aquarium in La Jolla. If you have to drink during the day, the aquarium is by far the best place to explore in San Diego while intoxicated. Have you ever chugged a 40 and then really taken a good look at live jellyfish? Those tentacles are amazing.

No, no, liquor is bad. But for those Bruins old enough to responsibly disagree, San Diego serves up some great bar scenes with sexy young patrons. Garnet Avenue in Pacific Beach, lined with bars, thrift stores, music retailers and pool halls, goes off at night, as does downtown's historic Gaslamp District. Even La Jolla's Prospect Street turns up the funk-o-meter a few notches at night, cutting loose at places like Jose's, Moondoggie's and the Hard Rock Cafe. The area around SDSU also gets pretty crazy, if Bruins can handle sucking it up for a while and venturing to a (gag) State school.

"We have over 45 TVs, and we get a huge UCLA crowd for the Bruin basketball games," says Todd Jilbert of Moondoggie's.

After a night of cavorting, the best place to wind up in the morning is buck-ass naked on the sand at Black's Beach, about a mile north of Scripps Pier. Black's Beach has earned notoriety over the years not necessarily because it is a nude beach, but because it is a nude beach with excellent waves. Mr. Black, for whom Black's Beach was named, actually lives farther south in front of another beach with excellent waves, Windansea in La Jolla.

No experience on a San Diego beach would be complete without taking part in a phenomenon called "body womping." Body womping is best enjoyed at Marine Street in La Jolla. It involves standing about waist deep in water a few feet from the shore and waiting for a massive wave to womp you onto the sand. After a hard landing, people traditionally yell, "Dude, killer womp!" The kids love it. Again, a little time on the exer-bike at the Wooden Center wouldn't hurt before giving womping a try.

Farther down the coast, south of Mission Beach, Belmont Park dares thrill-seekers to take a ride on a historic wooden roller coaster called The Giant Dipper. Other rides and interesting shops highlight Belmont Park, as well as an enormous public pool called The Plunge. The Plunge is bigger than Lake Tahoe, but it's a public pool. While that might not sound too clean, it's supposedly quite sanitary.

Bruins visiting San Diego have permission to keep going south, south, south, all the way to Tijuana where the drinking age is 18. Many clubs and bars wait for your patronage. Tijuana is also home to perhaps the most bizarre tourist photographic opportunity in the world. You and your friends can put on a sombrero, sit on a donkey adorned with colorful blankets and clothing and spend $10 to have a black and white Polaroid taken. Be sure to keep this memento in the glove box on the drive home, or the Border Patrol agent will see it and giggle. Then he'll make you stop while he shows the picture to his Border Patrol bud dies, and they'll all have a good laugh before letting you return to the United States. This can be embarrassing, and yes, it does happen!

Now that Bruins have a few ideas what to do in San Diego, two questions arise: how to get there and where to stay? Amtrak round-trip rates are $40 from Union Station in downtown L.A. to downtown San Diego or $32 from Union Station to Solana Beach, about 30 minutes north of downtown San Diego. The best bet by far is by automobile. Take the 405 South which merges with 5 South, which takes you to San Diego.

> No experience on a San Diego beach would be complete without ... a phenomenon called "body womping."

If you're from San Diego, call your parents. They might let you stay in your old room. If you have friends in San Diego, stay with them. If you have a Bruin buddy from San Diego, impose yourself on their family. Otherwise, find a hotel. La Jolla hotel rooms get a little pricey, except for maybe the Travelodge and the Sea Lodge (at La Jolla Shores). Downtown gets a little expensive, too, so try near Ocean Beach or Hotel Circle, near SDSU. It's all pretty simple, and a trip to San Diego is well worth the little effort required in getting there and finding accommodations.

While enjoying a San Diego getaway, it's always important to remember one thing: nobody has calves like your mother.

wet. Shirts, pants and other unmentionables flew off nimble bodies grooving to old-school and deep house. Beer and water were tossed around and soon everyone was soaking from head to toe in some type of liquid. Just my luck, I happened to be wearing a white blouse. I started to get nervous and finally rounded up my group to head off to the next club.

Unfortunately there would be no more clubs that night. Not a single cab in TJ would take us anywhere in our drenched condition. Cold, hungry and reeking of beer, four of us wandered aimlessly through the dark alleys and gutter streets of downtown TJ.

Ever watch the news and find yourself getting frustrated with those stupid kids that get themselves mixed up in bad situations? Yup. That would be us. Four naive little girls without a clue in a foreign country with little more than 50 bucks and a pack of gum between us. We finally found a McDonald's that had a walk-up window open 24 hours. The guy inside had the right idea. He was relaxing warmly, surrounded by food and hidden behind three inches of bulletproof glass.

Drunk as hell, I crashed on the slimy sidewalk while my friend attacked two British guys with questions like "Do you know where Robert Smith lives? Who's Robert Smith?!? From The Cure, dammit! You call yourselves English?!"

The next thing I remember it was night two of our adventure.

My friends and I were at a new club discovering the miracles of two-for-one drinks and Long Island Iced Teas. Do you know what are in those things? Every kind of liquor imaginable! It was heaven. That is until we got kicked out for throwing spit balls and playing with their plastic monkeys.

We hopped into another cab and told the driver we didn't care where we went as long as it was loud and rockin'. How the subject came up I can't remember, but we started talking to the driver about how weed is a federal offense in Mexico and that they would take you to a Guadalajara jail if you're caught with any on you. That freaked us out, but what was even scarier was the driver moaning "You like marijauna? You want marijuana? I take you to marijuana?"

I've seen enough "Cops" to know that this is not a cool deal. We got out at the next corner and waited for a safer cab to come by. It was at this moment I experienced Tijuana in all its frightening glory. Stray dogs roamed the streets among piles of dirty diapers and headless dolls. The shoddy houses against a background of dying streetlamps looked like remains of a bombed village in World War II. A one-armed man, in effort to beat out the competition, was already selling churros. He came towards us shrieking "Quieres churros? Si!" over and over. Limping closer and closer until. ...

Sorry to disappoint, but I can't recall any more than that. It's a mad blur of suppressed memories. Why I let myself become involved in the worst of after-school specials is still a mystery to me. Let's say peer pressure.

I did come away with some valuable cultural education however. Although I am Mexican-American, my parents decided I did not need to learn Spanish growing up. Not that you need much in TJ, but I did learn some valuable words. There are the staples "cerveza" and "tequila," and a brand new vocabulary word, "chupacabra!" (Another very scary element of Mexico. It's a weird cross between a bat, a monster and a vampire. The literal translation would be "goat sucker." It is also a very tasty drink.) Consider yourself educated.

There it is. I am pleased to say that I lived through such a traumatic experience and can now grace the public with my vast knowledge on the subject. In fact, there is a moral to the story. Tijuana, Mexico: scary shit.

COLUMN: Victory over USC proves that UCLA can rise to the occasion

Stan Johnson

I know that the following paragraphs are going to shock many of you. I am prepared to receive several responses, and, if I am lucky, many of you will write to Viewpoint explaining how I have become some crazed Bruin with no spirit or pride in our basketball team.

However, I have to say what I have to say and deal with the ramifications later.

We should not have beaten USC in basketball Wednesday night at the Los Angeles Sports Arena. Wait a minute. Don't get upset with me. Please listen to what I have to say.

The Bruins played well the entire game, but they played their best during crucial times. When Baron Davis fouled out just minutes before the game ended, and with the loss of Jelani McCoy, the

W. HOOPS: UCLA honors best women's basketball players with ceremony

By Chris Umpierre

UCLA is well known around the country for its great men's basketball program.

Most people know about the 11 national championships, legendary coach John Wooden and great players such as Kareem Abdul Jabbar, Reggie Miller and Bill Walton who have graced Pauley Pavilion with their collective presence.

But few know about the stellar history of the UCLA women's basketball program.

This history will be displayed and honored on Saturday, when the Bruins take on the USC Trojans at 2 p.m. in Pauley Pavilion. At halftime, the UCLA women's basketball program will honor the 1977-1978 national championship team and the program's 15 greatest players.

"A lot of people know about the history of the men's program, but the women's history is pretty stellar as well," assistant coach Pam Walker said, who has not only coached the last eight years, but is a former Bruin star.

The top 15 players have been selected as follows, in no particular order: Anne Meyers, Denise Curry, Anita Ortega, Dianne Frierson-Fowler, Sheila Adams, Nicole Anderson, Anne Dean-Gardner, Dora Dome, Mary Hegarty, Jackie Joyner Kersee, Dr. Karen Nash, Rehema Stephens, Necie Thompson, Sandra Van Embricqs and Natalie Williams.

VOLLEYBALL: Bruins to test its depth by utilizing entire bench during upcoming matches

By Grace Wen
Daily Bruin Staff

The UCLA men's volleyball team will be using the weekend to remove splinters from their butts.

The Bruins (11-0, 9-0 Mountain Pacific Sports Federation) will be testing the depths of its bench, as the second team will be given the chance to start on Friday night.

UCLA will be playing matches against Cal State San Bernardino and Cal State Northridge in the Wooden Center this weekend. Both matches will start at 7 p.m.

"We're going to play a lot of the guys sitting on the bench and give all 12 players a workout," UCLA head coach Al Scates said.

The Bruins have only played the Coyotes once and actually dropped a game to San Bernardino before winning the overall match.

The focus of the weekend will most likely be on Saturday night's match against the Matadors. Although Northridge is in the cellar of the Mountain Division, Scates expects more of a challenge from the Matadors.

"I'm not anticipating a strong match Friday but Northridge has given us trouble over here in our gym before, so we'll be ready for that," Scates said.

UCLA boasts a 36-2 record against Cal State Northridge. UCLA has won the last 13 times the teams faced off. However, one of Northridge's wins did come on Bruin territory.

Under first-year head coach Jeff Campbell, the Matadors currently have a 3-6 record and are 1-6 in conference play. Northridge's only conference win has come against USC, one of two teams that the Bruins have dropped a game to.

Northridge has been swept four times this season and will probably experience its fifth beating this weekend.

UCLA will continue to experiment with its lineup. The Bruins, who were voted No. 1 for the fifth straight week, have won with seven different lineups.

M.BASKETBALL: Shaken UCLA team could turn season around with win

By Brent Boyd
Daily Bruin Staff

Perhaps Kris Johnson said it best.

"If you can't get up for this basketball game, then you can't get up for anything."

When the Bruins travel up Tobacco Road this weekend to take on second-ranked Duke, it could be construed as the biggest game of the season thus far.

No, it won't count in the league standings, it won't determine a national championship, and a loss will not eliminate the Bruins from the NCAA Tournament.

But a win could do wonders to a team whose psyche has been teetering on the edge of self-destruction the past few months.

Freshman guard Earl Watson flies high, dishing off during the UCLA victory over the USC Trojans.

"It'll definitely be a big confidence booster for us," senior forward Kris Johnson said. "I think that's what it'll do mostly for us. I think that's what this team needs right now – is a big win there.

"We might be able to get some confidence back and hopefully shut up a couple of people's mouths that keep saying we're finished."

A blowout loss, on the other hand, could be disastrous for the team, which in the last week has lost one of its key players and have barely pulled out victories over Pac-10 also-rans USC and California.

"I just see this game as a big challenge for us," senior forward J.R. Henderson said. "It's an obstacle for us that we can either leap over or get smashed by."

But, Johnson was quick to add, "We're not going to put any kinds of ridiculous amounts of pressure upon ourselves."

The Bruins will be up against a team that has been extremely hot. Duke (24-2) has gone 13-1 in the extremely tough Atlantic Coast Conference, outscoring its conference opponents by an average of nearly 17 points per contest – the only loss coming to top-ranked North Carolina.

Led by guards Trajan Langdon and Steve Wojciechowski, Duke has shot an average of nearly eight three-pointers per game and has scored 88 points per game.

In addition, forward Roshown McLeod has performed excellently – averaging a team-high 17.2 points per game in the conference season.

UCLA head coach Steve Lavin sees this game as an excellent litmus test for the Bruins.

"It will kind of simulate the conditions that they'll face in the NCAA Tournament," he said. "I think we're just at a point in the season where it's really more than Duke being important.

"We have five opportunities to look good before the NCAA Tournament."

For the Bruins to hang tough, they will need a good performance from their big guys as well as solid performances from the freshmen guards Earl Watson and Baron Davis – tasks easier said than done – considering the raucous atmosphere at Cameron Indoor Stadium, an arena in which the Blue Devils have won 20 consecutive contests.

BASEBALL: Bruins' young talent must confront vast experience of Stanford

By Kristina Wilcox

Both teams played in the College World Series last year. Both teams lost a few players to the amateur draft and brought in a lot of freshmen for the 1998 season.

Yet the difference between the UCLA and Stanford baseball squads is in the pitching.

When the No. 14 Bruins host the No. 1 Cardinal this weekend for three games at Jackie Robinson Stadium, three veteran pitchers will start for Stanford (10-0-1), while UCLA (7-4, 2-0 in Six-Pac) will counter with three underclassmen who had never started a college game on the mound before the 1998 season.

Regardless, UCLA pitching coach Tim Leary is confident in his three starters.

"Stanford has more experience in their starting pitching than we do, but our guys have a lot of talent. We just have to keep going out there and keep learning from every outing."

UCLA has indeed been learning as it plays. The players are riding a six-game winning streak into the weekend, after starting the season on a 1-4 slide.

UCLA's weekend pitchers – sophomore Rob Henkel (1-2, 7.64 ERA), true freshman Chad Cislak (2-1, 6.00), and redshirt sophomore Ryan Reightley (0-0, 6.94) have all chipped away at high ERAs to bring them down to a respectable level.

But they are countered this weekend by what many call the best pitching rotation in the nation. All three are juniors and all were on Pre-Season All-American teams.

Friday's game will feature the pitching of righthander Jeff Austin (3-0, 2.00), who was the No. 1 starter in the 1997 U.S. National Team.

Left-hander Brent Hoard (1-0, 5.52) starts on Saturday. He was the Pitcher of the Year in the premiere summer league at Cape Cod.

The series finale features right-handed starter Chad Hutchinson (2-0, 4.12), who is also the quarterback for the Cardinal football team.

"We've got the work cut out for us," UCLA head coach Gary Adams said. "You never go into a game thinking you're going to lose. We're going into all of these games believing we're going to win.

"But it's not gonna be easy."

Trojan defeat would help honor alumnae

PREVIEW: Former UCLA champs to view game against crosstown rival

By Chris Umpierre

The UCLA women's basketball team is planning a big party for Saturday afternoon in Pauley Pavilion, and they are hoping that some Trojans don't come in and spoil the fun.

The Bruins (15-7, 10-3 Pac-10) are planning to honor the 1977-1978 UCLA National Championship team, the only one in school history, and the program's top 15 players at the halftime of their game against Southern Cal (10-12, 5-8 Pac-10) which begins at 2 p.m. on Saturday at Pauley Pavilion.

But head coach Kathy Olivier knows that the Trojans want to come in and spoil the celebration.

"Our team has to come out ready to play against them," Olivier said. "Who cares if they are in seventh place in the Pac-10 and are having a bad year? That means nothing. They are going to come in here and want to be the spoilers and kick our butts."

The Bruins will be playing in front of the best that have ever suited up in blue and gold for the program, and a loss in front of the likes of former coach Billie Moore, Anne Meyers, Denise Curry, and Natalie Williams would truly ruin the festivities.

"I know it would put a damper on the evening if we don't win," Olivier said. "I think our players are going to get up for it. It's 'SC, if you can't get up for 'SC then you can't get up."

Olivier also feels some pressure from the fact that legendary Bruin coach Billie Moore, who amassed 296 victories in her stellar career, will be sitting in the stands.

"I like doing well in front of her," said Olivier, who took over the program in 1993 after being an assistant coach under Moore for seven years. "Just because I know if we make mistakes she'll get on me, which is good."

Maylana Martin, UCLA's All-American forward candidate, feels the pressure won't come from the stands but from the standings.

"Just the fact that we are playing USC and we need to win anyway is going to be the pressure enough," Martin said.

The Bruins are currently in second place in the Pac-10 conference at 10-3 and need a win not only to stay within an arm's length of Stanford, who has a 11-1 record, but to stay in reach of a tournament bid.

Although UCLA has 15 wins on the year, only two have come against ranked opponents (against Washington and Duke).

The Bruins will have to bring their "A" game on Saturday to defeat the Trojans, who have not only owned the crosstown rivalry (28-19), but despite their poor record, have the ability to challenge UCLA this season.

On Jan. 23, when these two teams met at USC's Lyon Center, the Lakers 131, Nuggets 92

Rick Fox scored 22 points and Kobe Bryant had 21 Thursday night as the Los Angeles Lakers ended a season-high three-game losing streak with a 131-92 rout of the Denver Nuggets.

Shaquille O'Neal added 19 points and 11 rebounds, helping the Lakers beat Denver for the seventh consecutive time. The 5-47 Nuggets lost their fifth in a row overall.

LaPhonso Ellis and Johnny Newman scored 19 points for Denver.

The Lakers led 64-38 at halftime, building the big lead even though starting point guard Nick Van Exel was at home with a cold and a sore right knee.

The Nuggets, 0-28 against teams with winning records, took an early 14-10 lead. But the Lakers, also playing without injured forward Robert Horry and reserve Corie Blount, responded with a 17-1 run and went on to their most-lopsided win of the season.

Heat 89, Clippers 80

Alonzo Mourning had 28 points and P.J. Brown had a career-high 20 rebounds Thursday night, leading the Miami Heat to an 89-80 win over the Los Angeles Clippers.

Tim Hardaway added 16 points as the Heat beat the Clippers several hours after the teams made a trade just ahead of the NBA deadline.

Miami sent backup center Isaac Austin, rookie guard Charles Smith and a 1998 first-round draft choice to the Clippers for Brent Barry, the 1996 NBA slam-dunk champion.

None of those players suited up for the game, and both teams had just nine players in uniform.

Rookie Maurice Taylor led the Clippers with 17 points and Eric Piatkowski added 16 for Los Angeles, which lost its fifth straight game.

The Heat led 53-45 at halftime and outscored the Clippers 11-2 to start the third quarter. Mourning capped the spurt with a pair of dunks.

Miami was in command the rest of the way, and Clippers only made the score respectable with a game-ending 12-0 run after Mourning left for good.

Brent Barry goes to Miami

Brent Barry, the 1996 slam dunk champion, was traded Thursday by the Los Angeles Clippers to the Miami Heat for Isaac Austin, rookie Charles Smith and a 1998 No. 1 draft choice.

The teams played each other Thursday night at the Anaheim Arena. Neither Austin nor Barry suited up for their new teams.

Barry, who will be a free agent at the end of the season, had told the Clippers he did not intend to re-sign with them next summer. He's expected to be the third guard in Miami's rotation behind Tim Hardaway and Voshon Lenard.

Miami coach Pat Riley said the 26-year-old Barry, the son of NBA great Rick Barry, will be sidelined for another five or six days because of a sprained right ankle he suffered Monday against Houston.

"We feel extremely pleased with what we were able to get for Ike," Riley said. "Ike was a very, very important part of our team, we're going to really miss him. But we feel we get back a very young player who is exciting. He has great size, a player who can play (three positions) for us. We feel like he has a real huge upside."

Bruins limber up for annual Classic

GYMNASTICS: Injuries may help, not hurt team that traditionally starts off slowly, finishes strong

By Christie DeBeau
Daily Bruin Contributor

The UCLA women's gymnastics team (8-1) is back at home this weekend to host the second annual Bruin Classic on Sunday at 2 p.m. in Pauley Pavilion. The Bruins will face the competition of No. 7 Penn State (6-2), No. 14 Oregon State (5-1) and Cal State Fullerton (2-4).

In addition to the tough competition at this meet, fifth-ranked UCLA will be honoring its three senior members – Stella Umeh, Andrea Fong and Carmen Tausend.

For walk-on senior Fong, this season has provided an exciting final year competing for the Bruins, and she is eager to compete at home this Sunday.

"I love competing at home. Pauley has this magical feeling with the home crowd and all the fans. Also, it is nice to compete at home with your own equipment where you are used to everything," says Fong.

The Arizona meet, on Jan. 23, marked her first time performing in all-around competition at the collegiate level. Last week, at the meet against Cal, Fong beat her personal best for all-arounds with a score of 38.525.

"I am excited about my performances this year," Fong said. "This is the most I have ever competed since I have been here and I have done well for myself. It is exciting to get to contribute on the competition floor."

Sunday's meet also holds significance for junior Susie Erickson, who will compete at home for the first time in her second meet of the season, after a three and a half month break from competition due to a broken foot.

Last week, Erickson returned to competition on the balance beam, earning a score of 9.65, and performed an exhibition on the uneven bars.

"It feels really good to be a part of the team again," Erickson said. "It is really fun and exciting to be competing. I am glad to back. Everyone is really supportive, and Valorie is very supportive, so it was a smooth transition.

"I think my first meet was really successful, and I feel good about where I am at right now. I have been working on beam and bars, trying to get a bar routine, hopefully. I just keep working, going in the right direction with my ankle and taking care of myself."

Erickson plays an important role on the Bruin team because of emotional and physical stability during competition. She has worked hard to return to competition this season and as a result of her efforts, Erickson is stronger than she was before the injury.

"Susie plays a part on the team because she is such a rock for us; the team feels so much stability when she is competing," UCLA head coach Valorie Kondos said. "She is very confident and calm on the floor. She always comes in prepared and competes with confidence.

"Whether she falls or not, is not the issue. It is the fact that from the minute she is in that training room and in the gym warming up, you can count on her to be emotionally and physically stable the whole time she is out there while some athletes run high and low.

"It is also good to see an athlete work so hard. She is in twice as good of shape as she was when she got injured. So she really did the job that was expected of her over the break. She has worked hard, endlessly, and she is a much better athlete now than when she got injured."

The Bruins have adjusted to many changes throughout this season, mainly because of injuries. Top all-arounder Mohini Bhardwaj remains out this week due to ankle injury, joining junior Luisa Portocarerro, who has a sprained ankle. However, the team has persevered and has used these unexpected turn of events as a team building experience.

"I think it has been a good thing," Kondos said. "Mohini is coming along very well, and I think if it were Nationals we would definitely be

HISTORY

"When you look at the list of the 15 greatest players, you see that those are some terrific players on that list.

"Most people don't even know that Jackie Joyner Kersee (Olympian track star) played basketball at UCLA. She didn't just play, she was terrific."

Kersee was known as a defensive stopper when she played, from 1980-1984. But she did contribute on the offensive end, averaging 9.6 points and 6.2 rebounds per game.

Kersee, who is arguably the greatest female athlete of all time, is not the only celebrity who will attend on Saturday.

"I am overwhelmed at who's going to be here," head coach Kathy Olivier said. Olivier has been involved in the program as a head coach or assistant for 12 years. "I am in awe. Hopefully our (current) players will understand what this means."

The team's current All-American candidate, Maylana Martin, who one day hopes to make the honored list, understands what it means to have these legendary Bruins at the game.

"It means a lot just to have them there," Martin said. "They paved the way for us. They did something that no other UCLA team has been able to do (win a national championship). It's going to be fun to meet them."

Olivier knows exactly how well these Bruins played in their heyday. She played against most of them while playing for UNLV and Cal State Fullerton between 1978 and 1982.

"To be honest, I played against all of them ... I'd like to forget that time because they all kicked our butts," Olivier said. "They were awesome back in their time."

But before one speaks of the 15 greatest players of all time, one needs to talk about the coach that made most of these players into the players they were. Legendary coach Billie Moore was at the helm of the program for 16 years. In 1978, her first season at UCLA, she captured the program's first and only national title.

"Without her, UCLA women's basketball wouldn't be where it is today," said Olivier, who was an assistant to Moore for seven years.

"She's a phenom. She has done so much for women's basketball – not just for UCLA, but everywhere. She is someone I look up to as much as I look up to my mother."

Among Moore's many impressive stats are her 296 wins, which put her near the top for most victories in women's basketball history. She also took the Bruins to the NCAA tournament for six years.

"She's nationally known and nationally respected," Walker said.

"A lot of coaches even now look to her for guidance to help build their programs – both men's and women's."

Anne Meyers and Denise Curry are two of the most prominent members of the all-time team. Both have left an indelible mark on UCLA women's basketball history.

Meyers, a point guard, averaged 17.4 points and 8.4 rebounds per game in her Bruin career. Those were numbers that put her in both the Naismith and UCLA Basketball Hall of Fame. She was also selected 1978 women's basketball College Player of the Year when she led her squad to the title.

Meyers is currently a commentator for the Women's National Basketball Association on NBC and also does play-by-play for other women's basketball games on ESPN.

Denise Curry was Meyers' front-

JOHNSON

Bruins were not supposed to win.

But, with tenacity, determination and a strong will to survive, the Bruins were able to fill in the gaps left by Davis and McCoy by playing like a family.

Ironically, the loss of Jelani McCoy is probably the best thing that has happened to the basketball team since the freshman duo of Earl Watson and Davis.

I am not saying that McCoy hampered the team or that he was not a great contributor. Obviously, he was an excellent inside player who stepped up whenever the team needed leadership, not to mention he's a hell of an athlete.

However, McCoy's absence gave the Bruins the much needed determination to focus and pull together at a time when they needed to most.

This was evident in the USC game. The Bruins had to deal with freshman phenom guard Davis well before the end of regulation, yet the Bruins still managed to come away with the win.

Many critics have already predicted that McCoy's loss is going to hurt the Bruins' chances throughout the rest of the season. In fact, several sports writers and newspapers are already predicting that because of this major loss, the team is going to get slaughtered against Duke.

I beg to differ. If the Bruins look at the way they beat USC and fundamentally realize how they overcame all obstacles and stuck together to pull off one of their most impressive wins ever, then they definitely have what it takes to beat Duke.

Perhaps the best way to understand my rationale is to think of a child leaving home for the first time. When he leaves, he takes one of the biggest steps in his life toward gaining his own independence. The parents have given him the tools to survive. Now, all he has to do is apply the skills and learn to live and think for himself. Similarly, the Bruins have lost someone who they care a great deal about.

Considering this, the Bruins have two choices. They could either continue to lament the loss of McCoy, or they can accept the loss as a positive stepping stone toward bringing unity, love and stability back to the team. By choosing the latter option, the Bruins will regain those attributes that are required for becoming champions.

What the Bruins did against USC was great. Most, if not all, of us felt as though we were going to wipe out the Trojans, partly because they suck, and partly because we have handed them a beating for seven consecutive times.

But, the Trojans played with dignity. They did not want to lose against the Bruins (which was wishful thinking), and they demonstrated this by sticking together and not giving up.

This was a challenge to our team. But the Bruins accepted the challenge and demanded the respect that has made UCLA one of the top basketball programs in the nation.

Yes, Jelani McCoy's loss is a significant loss to our basketball program, in the same way a child is a significant loss to a family when he leaves his parents' home.

No matter what, they will both survive, because Jelani still has love and respect from his teammates and family members, just as the child who leaves home will always have his parents.

As the No. 12 Bruins prepare to travel to North Carolina to face the court mate. Curry dominated in her four years at UCLA, averaging a school record 24.6 points and 10.1 rebounds per game on her way to 3,098 points, also a school record. Like Meyers, she is an inductee into both basketball Halls Of Fame.

Curry is currently a head coach at California State Fullerton.

"I just remember Denise always complaining," Olivier said. "I remember turning to her and telling her, 'What are you crying about ... ?' She was a machine.

"I remember Anne (Meyers) saying to me in my freshman year when I was frustrated, 'It's okay, you are going to be good someday.' UCLA women's basketball was big time."

Natalie Williams, another prominent player, played more recently in the program.

From 1990-1994 Williams scored on opponents at will. Her 20.4 career points per game rank her second all-time only to Curry. Her 12.8 boards a game put her as the UCLA record holder. For her spectacular play, Williams was selected Pac-10 Conference Female Athlete of the Decade in February of 1996.

Williams' Bruin career didn't stop at basketball, as she excelled at volleyball as well. She is the only Bruin to ever receive All-American awards in those two sports.

Although Williams has stopped playing volleyball, her storied basketball career has been reborn as an All-Star in the American Basketball League for the Portland Power.

"Anne and Denise were four-time All-Americans," Olivier said, when asked to pick the best players to ever come out of the program. "They made everyone around them better.

"Natalie Williams has to be up there also because of her sheer athletic ability. Right now she will probably get the MVP of the ABL, which is amazing for someone who came into UCLA really a volleyball player. She's got to be up there with Anne and Denise."

But the list of stellar Bruin women's hoops players doesn't stop with these three, or even with the 15 selected for Saturday. It also contains the many role players who also helped the program.

These players' contributions to their alma mater haven't stopped on the basketball court, as they have continued to contribute to the program. Some have elected to continue their careers on campus, as has Tami Breckenridge, a UCLA assistant athletic director. Some just return every now and then to lend a hand, like Williams, who returns to help out the post games of some of the forwards on the team.

These players haven't stopped contributing to the program just because they no longer wear blue and gold on the court.

"We have been surrounded by people from that championship team," Walker said.

"Certainly their continued involvement and support in our program has led us to the point where we are starting to see some success of our own now. It is all built on what they did in the past."

This support has helped the current Bruins make some history of their own, as they have raced out to the best start to a Pac-10 season in school history as the team is currently in second place at 10-3 in conference.

Saturday's game is about honoring the countless contributions these players have made to the UCLA women's basketball program.

"It's all a part of what we think is important," Walker said.

"It's not just about being on the court, its about after you leave here continuing to be a Bruin. It's all part of what Saturday is all about."

Blue Devils, they already know that they have their hands full. No one needs to tell them that they will be playing against the No. 2-ranked team in the nation. They already know this.

But what the Bruins need to do is meditate on how they pulled together against USC Wednesday night and realize that they are a winning team, not because they won by having more points but because they have taken that first step toward rehabilitating themselves and gaining the independence that will make this team the stuff legends are made of.

If the Bruins can keep their heads about them and stay focused with the same tenacity and determination that they displayed against USC, then Duke will definitely have their hands full – and possibly deal with the reality of losing to a team that has become a real family.

Stan Johnson is the sports editor of the Daily Bruin who empathizes with Jelani McCoy. He can be reached at sjohnson@media.ucla.edu for questions, comments or criticisms. He is also a die-hard basketball fan and is happy that Steffi Graf is back on the WTA (tennis) tour.

W.BASKETBALL

Bruins squeaked through with a 68-64 victory. The Trojans had a chance to push the game into overtime, but failed on a three-point try by Kristin Clark, who finished the game with 25 points. Some Bruin free throws sealed the deal.

"We need not to play like we did last time against them," Martin said, who is coming off arguably her best game as a collegiate. Saturday against Cal, she was a nearly perfect 14 of 16 from the floor and finished the game with 28 points and 7 rebounds.

"We need to come out and show them what kind of a ball club we really are. We didn't play the best game against them. We can't let them take us out of our game again."

Not only will the top 15 players of all time be in attendance, but so will many other onlookers, as Olivier expects a big crowd.

"I've been hearing that it is going to be a bigger crowd than Stanford, which is just great for women's basketball," Olivier said. The team had a school record 5,662 in the stands when they played Stanford at home this year.

"It's good for women's basketball to get that kind of a fan base."

But the big crowd and the half-time festivities could all be ruined by a scrappy Trojan team on Saturday.

"Hopefully our players will step up and have a tremendous afternoon because that would cap off the celebration of the 15 greatest players and the national championship team coming back," assistant coach Pam Walker said.

GYMNASTICS

competing her, but we want her to heal as much as possible before we bring her back in. Luisa has a more severe sprain, and hopefully we will have her back by Regionals.

"Take into account that those two will be back for us at Nationals, it has actually been a good thing. It has allowed us to compete our entire team and give those athletes that do not get a lot of competitive experience more experience, and they have done great. It is like the season is choreographed, just how I would have choreographed it myself."

"Overall, we have had to work through some difficult times with injuries and sickness," Fong said. "We are on the upper climb towards the Pac-10 and our championship season. I think we are on a good track to get to the NCAA. I think that everyone has stepped it up a little bit because we have different people competing on different events that they do not compete on."

UCLA is already halfway through the regular season, with only four meets left until Regionals. The Bruins are used to starting off slow and although they are ahead of themselves compared to last year's team, the team's talent is still developing.

"We start off so slowly, as everyone in the world knows," Kondos said. "For our talent, we are still starting off slowly but we are about four weeks ahead of where we were last year, score wise and only having one fall last meet. So, I think we are going to see a team at the end of Regionals and Nationals that is going to beat any other UCLA team we have had here, and we have had some great teams."

How to Write an Effective Ad
- Start your ad with the merchandise you are selling. This makes it easier for readers to quickly scan the ads and locate your items.
- Always include the price of your item. Many classified readers simply do not respond to ads without prices.
- Avoid abbreviations—make you ad easy for readers to understand.
- Place yourself in the reader's position, ask what you would like to know about the merchandise, and include that in the ad. Include such information as brand names, colors and other specific descriptions.

Social Eyes.

Well, ain't she a sight for sore eyes. Looks like socializing can have its side effects. Seeing must be downright painful for her this morning. Recent studies show MOST UCLA students drink no more than 4 when they party. So what? Students who drink 4 or less have better love lives, better grades, and have the ability to see the writing on the wall or is that chalk board.

DONE 4

Oh what a night. Sure, you pretty much already had your fill when everybody sat down for a quick round of quarters. Of course you didn't want to be the odd one out. Don't want to disappoint the gang now do you? Yeah, it was a great party. Great fun! Actually twice the fun once you started seeing double! But hare it is, the morning after, and you catch a real eyeful in the mirror. Good morning Sunshine! You can't hide those Social Eyes! Or is that blood shot eyes? Along with Mr. Sunshine accosting those big baby blues came a Ska drum-fever in your head, a rollet coaster in your stomach, and a wonderful poo poo taste in your mouth.

So you got a little pie-eyed. Aye Caramba! Now if you could only remember where you left your sun glasses. Alas, some folks never learn. And here's the real eye opener. Most UCLA students drink 4 or less when they party. Some don't drink at all. Some are vegetarians. Some like disco. Some think that these Public Service Announcements are nothing more than an eyesore. (If you're one of those who think that, I've got two words for you and they aren't "Go Bruins.") Anyway, if you're having a problem seeing things eye to eye, and your bud seems to be in the eye of a tornado, keep an eye out for yourself and remember when you've done your'e done. Aye, Aye, Capt'n.

Dixon says UCLA discriminated

LAWSUIT: Former Family Medicine resident intern claims that he received undo criticism

By Kathryn Combs
Daily Bruin Staff

David Dixon, a former medical resident at UCLA, was dismissed from the Department of Family Medicine's intern program two months before receiving his license to practice medicine.

In response, Dixon filed suit Jan. 6 claiming he was discriminated against by UCLA and the Department of Family Medicine and was terminated under false pretenses. Dixon is asking for $10 million upon the resolution of this case.

Released from the program on March 31, 1994, Dixon filed an administrative complaint on Aug. 31, 1995. Administrative hearings continued through May 1997. However, according to Melanie Lomax, legal counsel for Dixon, the hearings resulted in a stalemate.

"The university stood fast with their decision," Lomax said.

"(Dixon) lost confidence that he would be reinstated through the internal appeal process so he decided to take his case to court," Lomax said.

Legal counsel for UCLA refused to give comment at this time.

The university did not comment regarding why Dixon was released from the program.

However, according to Dixon, the university alleged he was not fulfilling his responsibilities.

"I never had one patient complaint or wrote one wrong order or hurt anyone," Dixon said.

"He was consistently accused of subjective things, like he was too slow and did not have an adequate knowledge base. It is his position that, as the first black male in that department, he was subject to different standards," Lomax said.

"It is our contention that they blew everything out of proportion," Lomax said.

"One obstacle after another was placed in his way to prevent him from getting his license," she added.

Admitted to the UCLA Department of Family Medicine as a resident in 1993, Dixon learned that he was the only African American resident in the department in the last 17 years.

"It is an extra racially hostile atmosphere in the department of family medicine," Lomax said. "Their admission that there has not been a female or male African American doctor in the department is a clear indication of institutional racism."

However, Dr. Alan Robinson, associate senior dean of the School of Medicine, said the medical school prides itself on its racially diverse atmosphere.

"We do not discriminate based on race, and I am very proud of our years of trying to recognize that the physician who comes from a minority background has a high likelihood of going back to serve minority patients," Robinson said.

"Over the past 18 years, 12 times a UCLA medical student has been recognized as the top minority medical student by the Association of American Medical Colleges," he added.

"There is not anybody that can approach that record," he said.

Dixon, 37, grew up in Tucson, Arizona, where he attended mostly-white elementary and high schools. Dixon received his undergraduate degree in biology in 1983 from Fisk University in Nashville, Tennessee, a traditionally African-American college, and his graduate degree from the Medical College of Ohio at Toledo in 1993.

Law students face judgment day at Moot Court

COMPETITION: Aspiring lawyers present briefs, practice speaking skills

By Emi Kojima
Daily Bruin Contributor

The courtroom was cold. Three black-robed judges sat in a row at the bench with the U.S. flag to their right and the California state flag to their left.

They scrutinized the lawyer who stood in front of them.

"Why was that?" the judge in the middle interrupted the lawyer in mid-speech.

She began to respond, but the judge interrupted her again, "Why was that?"

This grilling of UCLA law students by formidable judges was part of Saturday's honors Moot Court competition held by students of the UCLA Law School.

Students participated in the three-round competition in a simulated appellate courtroom. Winners will be announced in about two weeks.

After this first round, the two teams gave sighs of relief.

"It's hard to know how you did," said Fred Wilks, a second-year law student. "You get nervous."

"Your mouth goes dry," said his partner, Russell Wetanson, also a second-year law student.

"And it's cold," opponent Azadeh Allayce said.

They competed for their resumes, for experience and for fun.

"It's a way to distinguish yourself as a law-school student," said Brian Barnes, a second-year law student.

These students are among the approximately 65 advocates who argued in Saturday's competition, after advancing from the fall competition of about 120 people.

The Moot Court board had to round up about 70 judges to evaluate their briefs and oral advocacy skills. Judges evaluate students on their speaking skills and prepared briefs on a fictional case.

"It's remarkable, sometimes, because they are better than real lawyers," said Marc Hankin, a patent attorney who judged the competition.

"Law students focus on the issues and are most highly interested in the material," he said.

Bill would force UCs to fund benefits for partners

LEGISLATION: Knight's proposal sets back, but would not end, program

By Brian Fishman
Daily Bruin Contributor

UC domestic partnership benefits may be destroyed shortly after getting off the ground.

A measure in the state senate, authored by Sen. William Knight, R-Palmdale, would not eliminate domestic partnership benefits, but would end state funding for them.

"The bill would not prevent these disbursements, but the university would have to raise their own money," said Andy Putno, a spokesman for Knight.

The proposed act requires that UCs find funding themselves. Perhaps by "raising tuition," Putno said.

Domestic partners are scheduled to receive benefits next fall. Such disbursements would cost the UCs $20 million per year, he said.

But, gay rights activists are fearful this bill's effects may reach far beyond the UC system.

"The most important thing this bill does is provide a chilling effect for all institutions providing domestic partnership benefits," said Ronnie Sanlo, director of the Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual and Transgender Campus Resource Center.

Knight claims that bill SB 1484 is needed to ensure the UC Regents do not usurp the public's authority. He claims the general public does not support domestic partnership disbursements.

"The legislature has declined to provide taxpayer dollars for these types of programs. The Regents are backdooring a policy the Senate would not enact," said Putno.

But, the reason Knight authored this bill is not in response to public outcry, said Ronnie Sanlo, Director of the Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, and Transgender Campus Resource Center (LGBT).

"If they didn't have homosexual issues, they'd have a hard time fundraising," Sanlo said.

The bill's chances of becoming law are unclear. There is opposition to the bill even in the senate education committee.

Tom Hayden, D-Los Angeles, an education committee member, will surely fight the bill, said Stephanie Reubin, a Hayden spokesman.

Yet, Knight does have supporters in Sacramento. His aides claimed that the bill is in line with Governor Wilson's policy.

UCSF Labor leader Karen MacLeod denounced the policy, but agreed that Wilson will support the bill.

"I would drop dead if he doesn't

AIDS team to study immune system

UCLA researchers will test a dormant part of the human body to see if they can regenerate an immune system in patients with AIDS.

Jerome Zack, associate director of the UCLA AIDS Institute, and Beth Jamieson will work with a $75,000 grant won by Zack from the American Foundation for AIDS Research. They will investigate if the thymus, which grows dormant after the age of 18, can reproduce T-lymphocyte cells, immune cells that combat viruses.

The researchers will transplant adult human thymus tissue into mice without immune systems and test whether the thymus grows active and produces T-cells. If successful, Zack and Jamieson will investigate whether the thymus can continue to function in the presence of HIV.

Last fall, these researchers made a similar discovery, finding that an HIV-infected immune system can regenerate itself with antiviral drug therapy.

"Our early research gave us hope that HIV directly affects the T-cells," Zack said. "Now we must determine if the adult thymus has potential to regenerate a new immune system."

USAC will hold student issues forum

USAC is sponsoring a town hall-style meeting Tuesday, where students can speak with UCLA representatives about issues ranging from campus construction to transportation to the Instructional Enhancement Initiative.

Present at the forum will be Charles Oakley, head of capital programs and campus architect; John Sandbrook, assistant provost of the College of Letters and Science; Renee Fortier, associate director of Transportation Services; and, tentatively scheduled to appear, Michael Foraker, director of housing administration.

The forum will be held Tuesday, from noon to 1:30 p.m. in the Ackerman second floor lounge, next to the grand ballroom.

UCSF faculty, students recognized

Four people at UC San Francisco recently were awarded the Martin Luther King Jr. Award for promoting diversity and ideals inspired by the civil rights leader.

Daniel Lowenstein, M.D., one of the recipients, served as co-chair of the Chancellor's Steering Committee on Diversity from 1995 to 1997.

In that position, Lowenstein helped develop programs addressing campus diversity and affirmative action. He also obtained funding for committee activities.

Stella Hsu, who served with Lowenstein on the steering committee, played a role in establishing programs that promote mutual respect, understanding and appreciation for cultural diversity at the campus.

Kyra Bobinet and Jennifer Danek, fourth-year medical students, received the award for the program of instruction they devised to help at-risk youth at a San Francisco youth guidance center.

Getty awards grant to Fowler Museum

The UCLA Fowler Museum of Cultural History was just given a $130,000 grant from the Getty Grant Program. The grant money will help fund publications about non-Western textile studies.

"Among the world's art forms, clothing traditions are one of those most intimately tied to fundamental issues of identity," Doran H. Ross, the Fowler Museum's director, said.

The Fowler Museum already publishes highly regarded scholarship on non-Western textile studies. Its own collective includes more than 10,000 items related to textiles which span two millennia and five continents.

Too cool to ski

Since its debut at the Winter Olympics in Nagano, the snowboarding craze continues to attract many enthusiasts who prefer its simplicity over skiing

By Meghan Ward
Daily Bruin Contributor

If you have never heard of carving, nose slides, tail grabs and 540s, then you have not yet joined the latest craze in snowtime entertainment. Debuting this year in the Winter Olympics in Nagano, snowboarding is the fastest growing winter sport in the world.

What's the big fuss? Why are kids of all ages rushing out to buy snowboards instead of alpine skis? Maybe it is because brand name companies like Levi's, Mountain Dew and American Express have used snowboarding as a marketing tool to reach Generation X and Generation Next.

Neil Ishibashi, captain of the UCLA snowboarding team and snowboarding club, thinks that younger kids see snowboarding as an extreme sport.

"When I was a kid, I was into Star Wars. Their idea of cool is the Mountain Dew image. Freestyle is more for the aggressive type of person. You have to take risks."

Freeriding is snowboarding down a hill, carving big turns. Freestyle is making use of the snowboard park and the half-pipe. The snowboard park is equipped with jumps, spines and rail slides. The half-pipe is a long, narrow run with steep sides similar to those in in a skateboard park and attracts advanced riders who prefer to spend more time in the air than on the mountain.

Snowboarding began in the 1960s when an inventor named Sherman Poppen got the idea from watching his daughter Wendy ride down the neighborhood hill standing on her sled. He tied a rope onto the tip of a board and called it a Snurfer (snow surfer).

Over the next decade, Poppen sold over 1 million Snurfers in toy stores throughout the country.

In the early 1970s, Dimitrije Milovitch was the first to incorporate metal edges into the snowboard. His Winterstick became famous in the first snowboarding video, "Apocalypse Now." Soon after, Jake Burton, a surfer and skier from Long Island and Tom Sims, a skateboarder from New Jersey, developed their own versions of the snowboard.

Until the mid-1980s, most ski resorts considered snowboarding to be a dangerous threat to skiers, limiting access or denying it altogether, forcing snowboarders to head for the back country where they would have to snowshoe up the mountain in order to practice.

Mountain High claims it was the first resort in Southern California to offer snowboarding. Alpine Meadows, in Lake Tahoe, is allowing access to snowboarders this winter for the first time, with a brand-new snowboarding park and half-pipe.

Between the giant slalom, the bordercross and the half-pipe, the challenges are endless. Ishibashi explains that in the bordercross, four to six racers go down a hill full of jumps, beams and gates, and the first two down advance to the next heat until one winner remains.

In UCLA's most recent competition as part of the Southern California College Ski and Snowboard Conference, competing against schools like UCSB, Cal Poly and USC, Ishibashi won first place, and Mike Rockwell, the team's president, took second.

Overall points are calculated for each event, including the bordercross and the giant slalom. To date, the UCLA men's snowboarding team has taken first place in every competition.

Rockwell explains that snowboarding has a much higher learning curve than skiing. "If you surf, that'll help you to pick it up really fast."

Cory Stein, fourth-year sociology student and member of the UCLA women's snowboarding team, agrees.

"If you can get through the first three times, you'll really enjoy it. Your first time you're going to be on your butt, but once you get it, it's so much fun."

Stein skied for several years as a child, but never really enjoyed it. Five years ago, she tried snowboarding, and now she rides at least once a week at Snow Summit and Mammoth

On Friday Assemblywoman Sheila Kuehl fielded questions from concerned faculty about technology affecting their jobs.

Kuehl and faculty conferred about two major issues: the ownership of online course material and student-faculty relations.

Because UCLA strongly suggests that faculty maintain a web site for their classes, some believe that is a requirement, according to Katherine King, UCLA associate professor of comparative literature.

"The misconception around campus is that it is required, when it isn't," King said.

Since fall quarter, UCLA has been charging students an instructional enhancement fee to maintain web sites.

The university assumes ownership of any text posted on a web-site unless it it is formally contested, according to a faculty member present at the hour-long query.

"We have to anticipate the fact that UCLA assumes they own our work," said Nancy Henley, professor emeritus of psychology.

Kuehl, from the 41st Assembly District, said she planned to take their concerns back to Sacramento.

Faculty members also expressed concern about the deterioration of relations with students because of virtual office hours.

"UCLA assumes they own our work."

Professor emeritus of psychology

Kuehl responded by pointing out that online interaction offers both faculty and students more flexible contact times.

Faculty members will "not be interrupted by a knock at the door at inopportune times," Kuehl said.

Although online student advising is not a substitute for faculty-student interaction, Kuehl acknowledges the usefulness of virtual office hours.

After anthrax scare, FBI raids home of researcher

SEARCH: Investigation fails to yield evidence to implicate Leavitt

By Dara Akiko Tom
The Associated Press

LOGANDALE, Nev. – FBI agents searched the home of a researcher again Sunday, even though the man was released from jail after tests showed he possessed a harmless animal vaccine, not a biological weapon.

More than a dozen agents descended on William Leavitt Jr.'s property in this small farming community 50 miles northeast of Las Vegas. Neighbors said the agents had been searching the home and an adjacent shed since Wednesday, when Leavitt was arrested along with Larry Wayne Harris.

Leavitt's lawyer, Lamond Mills, called the search "a fishing expedition" and said he planned to visit the home to "see what kind of shape the house is in and what they've taken."

"I think they're embarrassed, and I think they're looking for anything they can find to bring charges against Bill Leavitt," Mills said.

FBI agents at the scene declined to comment.

The search came on the eve of Monday's detention hearing for Harris, who remained jailed over the weekend on biological weapon charges.

A government lab on Sunday was still testing material seized from Harris' Ohio home to determine if it is a dangerous – and illegal – biological agent, federal sources have said. Harris is on probation for a 1995 conviction for illegally obtaining the bubonic plague bacteria.

The FBI says its investigation of both men is continuing even though authorities announced Saturday that a substance once feared to be the ingredients of a biological weapon turned out to be a harmless anthrax vaccine.

The material was seized from Leavitt and Harris on Wednesday in Henderson, Nev., just outside Las Vegas, triggering a nationwide scare. They were arrested on charges of possessing a biological agent for use as a

Pentagon hesitant in dealings with Saddam

MIDDLE EAST: Albright to reject Iraqi-U.N. deal if interests threatened

By Jim Abrams
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON – As the Pentagon began the process of calling up reserves, Secretary of State Madeleine Albright said Sunday the United States will act alone against Iraq if any U.N.-brokered agreement with Saddam Hussein jeopardizes U.S. interests.

Administration officials said they would be pleased if U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan returns from talks in Iraq with a promise that U.N. weapons inspectors can resume their work totally free from Iraqi limits or harassment.

But "it is possible that he will come with something that we don't like, in which case we will pursue our national interests," Albright said on ABC's "This Week with Sam and Cokie."

She said Saddam's ability to threaten the world with weapons of mass destruction must be diminished, by military means if necessary. "We will pursue that; that's what our job is, that's what we will do," she said.

After Albright and other senior American officials made similar statements on Sunday's television news shows, Annan's spokesman in Baghdad, Fred Eckhard, said Annan and Saddam had reached agreement on opening up presidential palaces to inspection, the last main condition for avoiding a U.S. military attack.

White House spokesman Mike McCurry said preliminary accounts had been received from Baghdad, but he declined to assess them. "We've got a lot of serious questions. It's a very serious matter at a serious time, and we want to get some questions answered," he said.

Another senior administration official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said "we have not got any details" from the Annan negotiations and that "we'll look at it carefully when he gets home." Annan is expected to return to New York on Tuesday.

Campaign reform likely to stall

CONGRESS: Neither side seems able to drum up support for legislation

By David Espo
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON D.C. – Campaign finance legislation takes a bow in the Senate this week and is likely to be ushered off the stage almost as quickly as it appears.

"We'll have a few days of debate, and it will be clear there are not 60 votes for any approach," predicted Republican Sen. Mitch McConnell of Kentucky.

He's an implacable foe of the legislation to ban "soft money" and impose other restrictions on the campaign spending system. But proponents don't disagree with that scenario, despite a fresh attempt by Maine's moderate GOP Sen. Olympia Snowe to break a deadlock on the thorny issue of union political activity.

"I will admit that I do not believe they (60 votes) are there," Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) said at the weekend, conceding that supporters of campaign finance legislation won't likely be able to break a filibuster. Interviewed on CNN's "Evans and Novak," McCain said the bill he co-authored will garner more support than last fall, and "I will view that as an accomplishment."

Majority Leader Trent Lott arranged to bring the measure to the floor Monday as part of a negotiated settlement that ended last autumn's campaign finance combat.

IRAQ: Talks don't end conflict, but bring hope to dangerous situation

By Robert H. Reid
The Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq – U.N. chief Kofi Annan and Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein settled the last major obstacle Sunday to opening presidential palaces to U.N. arms inspectors, the main condition for avoiding a U.S. attack, Annan's spokesman said.

The agreement came during a three-hour meeting between Annan and Saddam at the Republican Palace, one of eight presidential sites that Iraq had declared off-limits to U.N. weapons inspectors, said U.N. spokesman Fred Eckhard.

"We've reached an agreement," Eckhard said. "We have a text."

"We expect the text will be acceptable to all 15 members of the Security Council," including the United States, he said.

One Iraqi official, who also insisted his named not be used, was asked whether there was a deal. He replied, "Yes."

Annan and Iraq's deputy prime minister, Tariq Aziz, met late Sunday to agree on the precise wording of an agreement the secretary-general will take back to the Security Council.

The crisis over weapons inspections has brought the Persian Gulf to the brink of war.

The Associated Press

U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan (left) watches as Iraq's President Saddam Hussein shakes hands with Annan's legal adviser.

The United States has sent a naval armada and 25,000 troops to the region to mount air strikes unless Iraq agrees to open all sites, including eight presidential palaces, to the U.N. weapons inspectors.

Pro-Iraq protests have erupted across the Arab world – Jordan had to send out tanks in one desert city to contain them – and sent Israelis scurrying for gas masks. Diplomats there have been preparing to leave.

Any deal must be endorsed by Washington, which has said it would refuse an agreement that it believes undermines the inspectors' authority.

White House spokesman Mike McCurry said preliminary accounts had been received from Baghdad, but he refused to assess them. "We've got a lot of serious questions. It's a very serious matter at a serious time, and we want to get some questions answered," he said.

Britain, America's strongest backer for a military strike, also reacted cautiously.

"The expectation is that Kofi Annan will make an announcement in the morning whether a deal has been brokered," a spokesman for Prime Minister Tony Blair said on customary anonymity. "Even then, he will report back to the Security Council the details of that."

Political quarrels turn deadly as parties battle for power

INDIA: Parliamentary elections surrounded by violence, claim 12 lives

By Ranjan Roy
The Associated Press

NEW DELHI, India – Bloody political clashes marred voting Sunday in India's parliamentary elections, which took place amid another distraction – the sudden collapse of the government in the country's largest state.

Twelve people were killed in factional violence. Nearly 40 others were injured across the nine states that voted.

The turnout was 55 percent – slightly below average – on the second day of a six-day election, which completed voting for three-fourths of the 543 districts at stake. More than 600 million Indians are eligible to vote.

By Saturday, all but a few votes will be in, and ballot counting begins March 2.

Most deaths Sunday were reported from the eastern state of Bihar, where 20 people were killed in the first round of voting Feb. 16.

Gunmen shot and killed a communist supporter inside a polling booth.

Seven other people were killed in shootouts between rival gangs fighting for control of polling booths in different parts of the state. One person caught stuffing bogus ballot papers was beaten to death with sticks by activists of a rival political group.

"It this democracy? Whoever has more activists around a booth captures and prevents genuine voters," said Mohammad Idris, of Hajipur town in Bihar, who was turned back by political activists who said his vote had already been cast.

In the neighboring state of Orissa, one policeman was killed when leftist guerrillas attacked a security car carrying guards.

Two people died in West Bengal state.

Widespread rigging of votes also was reported, forcing election authorities to suspend polling in several booths.

More than 550 political activists, including two state government ministers, were arrested on charges of disrupting elections.

The Associated Press

Sushila Ray casts her vote with the help of her nephew.

"People are tired of elections. They have come too soon," said Madhukar Gawli, a voter in western Nagpur.

The elections are the second in less than three years – a result of inconclusive results from the 1996 vote.

As the voting proceeded, the country's attention was drawn to Uttar Pradesh, the largest state, where the government was suddenly toppled overnight.

The maneuver by small-party defectors could have national repercussions because the ousted government was controlled by the Hindu nationalist Bharatiya Janata Party.

The BJP is predicted to emerge from the national vote with the most number of seats, but without a majority. Uttar Pradesh sends 85 members to Parliament, more than any other state.

BJP's candidate for prime minister, Atal Bihari Vajpayee, declared a hunger strike in protest, alleging the dismissal was a coup aimed at seizing the state machinery to influence the voting.

A new government led by a tiny splinter party was sworn in late Saturday.

Apathy and fear of violence kept the turnout down in areas besides Bihar, including the tea-growing hills of southern Tamil Nadu state, where 54 people were killed in bombings just before elections began. The vote continues Monday, Saturday, March 7 and, in a remote mountain region, June 21.

Report reveals jet in crash was too high

TAIPEI, Taiwan – A China Airlines jet that crashed last week near Taipei airport, killing 202 people, was flying well above the standard altitude when it approached the runway, a newspaper reported Sunday.

Radar showed that when the Airbus A300-600R was about three miles from the airport, the jetliner was flying at 1,300 feet, much higher than the standard 900-foot approach, the China Times Express said.

The pilots attempted to descend quickly to correct the mistake, the paper said, quoting unidentified aviation sources.

No official reason for the plane's crash has been given, but investigators say the plane veered sharply to the left as it came in to land. It then crashed into a semi-rural area beside the runway and exploded, killing all aboard and six people on the ground.

About a week after the crash, only 32 of the victims have been identified by DNA comparisons demanded by police before any bodies can be released, newspapers reported.

Most bodies were badly charred and dismembered, making identification possible only by DNA comparison or dental records.

Pope exhorts 22 new cardinals

VATICAN CITY – Bestowing simple golden rings on the Roman Catholic Church's newest cardinals Sunday, Pope John Paul II reminded them that their job is more than just electing his successor.

In a special Mass of the Rings, the pontiff exhorted them to "look toward Christianity's third millennium, which he called an "occasion of renewal for believers."

The new millennium, he said, should signal "an extraordinary springtime of hope for ... all humanity."

The pope named 22 new cardinals from 13 different countries, but three did not attend the ceremonies. One Italian cardinal was in the hospital and the identities of two new cardinals remains a secret, most likely for political reasons. Vatican observers say they may be from China or Vietnam, where the church is suppressed.

Like the pontiff, most of the new cardinals are by-the-book conservatives. John Paul has now named 106 – or 86 percent – of the 123 cardinals eligible to choose his successor. Only cardinals under age 80 may vote for pope.

Southern California has best tap water

BERKELEY SPRINGS, W. Va. – The Metropolitan Water District of Southern California bills itself as the largest purveyor of treated water in the world.

Now it can call itself the best in the nation.

The district topped 42 water samples from 18 states Saturday night to win the municipal division at the "Toast to the Tap: International Water Tasting and Competition."

The district, which finished fourth last year, beat out first-time entry Montpelier, Ohio, followed by Huntington Station, N.Y; Dover, Del.; and Kent, Ohio, which also was fifth last year and first in 1996.

In the noncarbonated water category, McKenzie Mist of Blue River, Ore., finished first in a field of 37.

Oaza Tesanj, a product from Bosnia-Herzegovina that was sent to Berkeley Springs by a Red Cross volunteer who knew of the competition, won first place out of 10 entries in the sparkling water category.

The water-tasting contest at the Coolfont Resort is similar to wine-tasting. Judges examine, sniff and taste samples that are rated on appearance, odor, flavor, mouth feel and aftertaste. But it is the water without taste or smell that wins bragging rights.

Three juries make for logistical nightmare

TRIAL: Each suspect to be tried separately by attorney in murder case

By Linda Deutsch
The Associated Press

Prosecutors often get nervous about opening statements to the jury. But there's not much to compare with the challenge facing Deputy District Attorney Craig Hum when he stands up Monday to give three opening statements \to three separate juries in the Haing Ngor murder trial.

"Logistically the real challenge will be keeping everyone straight," said Hum, who is handling the high-profile murder case of three men charged in the 1996 shooting death of the Cambodian-born Ngor, 55, who won an Oscar for his role in the movie "The Killing Fields."

Movement and positioning of jurors in the courtroom will be so tricky throughout the trial that the process will require choreography of sorts, using color-coding, charts, maps, badges and a video system.

The defendants, alleged members of the Oriental Lazyboys, a Chinatown street gang, are accused of killing Ngor in a robbery outside his home. Their lawyers initially asked for three separate trials because the defendants had made tape-recorded statements potential-

Prime Minister Tony Blair. White House spokesman Joe Lockhart said that Clinton and Blair agreed to look closely at the details of any arrangement.

To emphasize U.S. readiness to act if the national interest is threatened, Cohen announced on NBC's "Meet the Press" that he was making the first request for reservists to provide combat support for the 32,000 troops stationed in the Persian Gulf. "We are hoping for a peaceful solution, but we are prepared to exercise a military option if necessary," he said.

The Pentagon said Cohen was asking President Clinton for authority to call about 500 members of the National Guard and Reserve for logistical support. If approved, Cohen would then ask the services to decide whom to activate. Cohen said, without specifics, that people would be mobilized from various bases.

Administration officials said Annan left for Iraq fully aware that there could be no maneuvering room on the key issues of total access and operational control for U.N. weapons inspectors. The Iraqi proposal of putting a time limit on inspections was unacceptable, they said.

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., said on ABC that he was "very nervous" about investing any negotiating authority in Annan when it was American lives that would be on the line in a military conflict. "We shouldn't have set up this scenario that the Secretary General of the U.N. is making those decisions," McCain said.

He and other senators said Congress is prepared to approve a resolution of support for military action but only if it includes backing for a long-term plan to end Saddam's ability to menace the world. "We have to be prepared to go the full distance, which is to do everything possible to disrupt his regime and to encourage the forces of democracy," Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., said on ABC.

Both chambers could take up Iraqi resolutions this week. National Security Adviser Sandy Berger, on "Fox News Sunday," repeated the administration position that it would welcome congressional backing, but he said, "I don't think we believe we need it as a legal matter. But, obviously, it would be a preferable way to proceed."

SNOWBOARDING

grab is when the rider touches his board while he's in the air. Spins are rated by how many degrees the rider turns as he flies off a jump or the lip of the half-pipe, and inverts are backflips. Rockwell explains that "you get rated on how big you go, variety of moves, and fluidity."

David Cash, a third-year anthropology student, prefers freeriding to freestyle. "If you took a surfer, I'm more of a longboard surfer – a soul surfer. I go on the mountain to make big turns."

Cash skied for 10 years before trying his hand at snowboarding. "There's so much to pay attention to when you're skiing. You have to worry about keeping your feet together and your poles. On a snowboard, you can be more creative. You're one mechanism going down the hill."

Newcomers to the sport may feel more like one mechanism face-first in the snow. For beginners, Rockwell advises that you borrow a board from a friend or rent one the first couple of times. He recommends making a day trip out to Snow Summit with a group of friends who are also learning to snowboard so as not to get too frustrated.

If possible, take a lesson and be sure to wear clothing that will keep you dry.

"Because if you get wet, you'll be miserable," Rockwell assures.

Anyone interested in buying used equipment should contact either Rockwell or Ishibashi via the Wooden Center. For those prepared to buy a new set, Stein recommends Val Surf in North Hollywood.

This season's gear may run from $500 to $800 for boots, bindings and a board.

If donning the latest innovations in technology and design is not your primary concern, a set from last season will run for considerably less.

On the upper body, wear a light shirt and fleece under a water-proof outer shell, snow pants to keep dry, and gloves with reinforcements in the hands especially designed for snowboarding.

According to Chris Duffy, manager of Val Surf, the best-selling brands in both equipment and clothing are Burton, Morrow, K2, Joyride, Lamar and Sims. For daily updates on snowboarding conditions all over the world, check out Yahoo's ski report at www.la.yahoo.com/external/ami

In California, Snow Summit at Big Bear, Mountain High, Mammoth Mountain and Alpine Meadows at Lake Tahoe are all equipped with snowboard parks, half-pipes, snowboarding rentals and lessons.

A warning to all novice snowboarders: Snowboarding is a highly addictive sport.

Stein plans to move to Lake Tahoe after graduation to be a snow bum. Cash has his heart set on the slopes of Colorado and Ishibashi claims he'll be in the Olympics.

"I told my parents I'm going to be in the Olympics in four years," he said. "My mother said, you're going to college so you can be a snowboarder?"

nation, tourism is getating dumped on by El Niño.

The Pacific weather phenomenon is pouring torrential rains on amusement parks and zoos and scuttling whale-watching cruises and other boating trips with storm-tossed seas.

"If the sun is out, it's just gang-busters. But we had only one decent day over President's Day weekend, so that has a tremendous effect," said Terry Koenig, vice president of sales and marketing for Blue & Gold Fleet, which runs boating tours to Alcatraz Island, one of San Francisco's top attractions.

The 25 percent to 50 percent drop in business has been enough to force layoffs and budget cuts, Koenig said.

"We're rather philosophical about it. There's nothing you can do," he said. "We know we really have to make hay when the sun does come out."

The lack of sunshine even put the skids on the filming of a commercial touting the state as a destination for romance. The ad, from the California Division of Tourism, is supposed to feature a couple in a row boat under a sun-drenched stone bridge at Stow Lake in San Francisco's Golden Gate Park.

"We've been delayed for the last month. We needed two consistent days of sunshine and we haven't had it," said state tourism director John Poimiroo. Filming finally began Friday.

While statewide figures on the financial impact of El Niño have yet to be tabulated, economists say it's hard to imagine the impact is not severe.

"People have lost money, that is the bottom line," said Jack Kyser, chief economist for the Economic Development Corporation of Los Angeles. "And they're losing business that they can't make up."

While officials at Disneyland and the Universal Studios tour are refusing to release attendance figures during this wet winter, they do admit that sales of umbrellas and ponchos are up at the parks.

Trams that meander through massive Universal complex are outfitted with clear sheeting that drops on either side to protect visitors from showers. Schedules of outdoor shows are rejigered to get the most in on a rainy day.

"You do the best you can," said spokesman Jim Yeager.

While El Niño may be cursing most of the state, it's been a blessing for California mountains, delighting skiers with record snows.

"We are the traditional contrarians in the tourism industry, and this is shaping up to be a very good year for the ski resorts," said Bob Roberts, executive director of the California Ski Industry Association.

At Mammoth Mountain in the eastern Sierra Nevada, 129 inches of snow have fallen so far this month compared to just six inches last February, according to spokeswoman Joani Saari.

And the 110 inches of snow that has draped Bear Mountain ski resort in the San Bernardino Mountains of Southern California so far this winter already has surpassed last year's season total of 102.5 inches, spokeswoman Judi Bowers said.

Along California's scenic coast, El Niño has swirled up colossal waves that have boosted surfboard rentals and wetsuit sales at Malibu Ocean Sports, said employee Terry Morich.

Rental of kayaks, though, are dramatically down.

"People are leery about the size of the surf and justifiably so," Morich said. "Often people will come down, we'll evaluate the conditions and they'll decide to head to the Malibu Inn and have a beer instead."

Island Packers is also feeling the brunt of El Niño-generated swells, having run only five whale-watching trips in the Santa Barbara Channel this month, compared to daily trips last February.

"If this continues much longer, I'm really going to start to get concerned," said co-owner Mark Connally.

Those who work in California's tourism industry are, of course, trying to put a positive spin on the soggy climate.

"You can experience a lot of Disneyland indoors and just dash from attraction to attraction. You're not running that far," insists spokesman Tom Brocato.

Of course, the rides are spread over 85 acres and the lines do tend to be outside, along with many of the rides themselves.

Napa Valley's wine country encourages callers to take advantage of the off-season, emphasizing that wineries are even less packed because of the storms.

"Sometimes it's more fun to visit a winery in the off weather because (winemakers) can spend more time with you and it's not crowded," said Lane Turchet of the Napa Sonoma Wine Country Visitor Service Center.

At the San Diego Zoo, spokeswoman Georgeanne Irvine said some animals – including polar bears, hippopotamus and pigs – are likely to be more active in the rain.

The zoo, though, has taken precautions in the face of El Niño– trimming trees to prevent branches from falling onto exhibits, and stocking up on food and sandbags.

"There is danger of erosion on some of the hillsides and flooding in the canyon areas," Irvine said.

During a respite in the rain late last week, the sun sparkled off the Pacific as the Allen family of Slough, England, cavorted on the Santa Monica Pier – rebuilt and reinforced after it was virtually destroyed in the last major El Niño in 1983.

This year's El Niño wasn't about to stop the family of four from coming to California on a February school break.

"No way at all," said Mark Allen, 42. "If you're going to go, you're going to go."

Besides, said his wife, Denise, "it's nothing compared to England's weather."

ly implicating themselves and each other in the crime.

The law severely limits use of such statements, particularly if a defendant does not testify.

Rather than order the cumbersome procedure of three separate trials with many of the same witnesses, Los Angeles County Superior Court Judge J.D. Smith came up with the solution of having one trial with three separate juries.

> The courtroom will be equipped with a video ... system similar to one used in the O.J. Simpson criminal trial.

The three-jury procedure has been used only once before in California – in a San Diego case – and the judge there called it "an extremely stressful event."

Jurors will be shuttled out of the courtroom periodically when testimony is being heard that doesn't apply to their defendant. Each panel will be brought in separately to hear opening statements, and the three groups will not be allowed to talk to each other.

Smith conducted three separate jury selections over the past month, with each group filling out questionnaires and each panel chosen from a pool of 100 prospects.

"It seemed to go very smoothly," said Superior Court spokeswoman Jerrianne Hayslett. "Judge Smith has tried cases with two juries before, so that experience helped him out."

But no courtroom in the busy downtown Criminal Courts Building ever has accommodated this many jurors before. There are 36 regular panelists and 12 alternates. They will fill chairs in the jury box, in two rows in front of the jury box and two rows of the spectator section.

The jury seats are color-coded, with a chart above the jury box providing a seating roadmap. Jury No. 1 is green, No. 2 is red, No. 3 is blue. Jurors will wear colored dots on their badges coordinating with their places in court.

Each group will be assigned one of the defendants: Tak Sun Tan, 21; Indra Lim, 20, and Jason Chan, 20, who are charged with killing Ngor outside his home near downtown on Feb. 25, 1996.

They know there are three juries but have not been told why the procedure is being used.

Authorities allege they were robbing Ngor and shot him when he refused to hand over a gold locket containing a picture of his wife, who died during the genocidal reign of the Khmer Rouge in Cambodia.

Ngor himself was tortured and imprisoned by the regime, which killed an estimated 2 million people from 1975-1979. He came to the United States in 1980.

The case has been complicated by suspicions within the Cambodian community that Ngor was killed because of his political beliefs or business activities.

Hum maintains the motive was simply a street crime by a gang known for carjackings and home invasion robberies.

Public defenders representing the three men have said that police arrested the wrong people.

However, Deputy Public Defender Steven Schoenfield declined comment for this story, saying all defense attorneys had decided to remain silent.

It is not known whether each will deliver an opening statement at the outset or wait until later in the trial.

There are puzzles about the case. Ngor's $6,000 Rolex watch was taken and never recovered but the robbers left his Mercedes-Benz and $2,900 he carried inside a jacket.

No gun or witnesses to the crime have turned up.

During a preliminary hearing, the prosecution's star witness recanted his testimony, saying police pressured him into stating that he saw the three young men running from the murder scene. But Hum said such recantations are common in gang cases and he expects the witness to appear at the trial.

With all 48 jurors often viewing evidence at the same time, the courtroom will be equipped with a video projection system similar to one used in the O.J. Simpson criminal trial. It allows for easy viewing of crime scene photos and other physical evidence.

"We will need three sets of all exhibits," said Hum, noting that when the juries deliberate each will be in a separate jury room examining the items in question.

> If convictions result, all three juries will have to remain for a penalty phase of the trial.

If convictions result, all three juries will have to remain for a penalty phase of the trial, since the charges carry a potential death penalty.

And if opening statements seem complicated, "closing arguments are going to be a real nightmare," Hum said, with the prosecutor required to segregate evidence presented to each jury separately.

The duration of the three-jury trial is uncertain.

"We have to keep 48 people healthy," Hum noted. "If one gets sick and it's only for a day, then all three juries would have to be in recess for that day. It could lengthen the trial."

AGREEMENT

Annan met with the Iraqi leader after talks with Aziz since Friday failed to resolve the last major obstacle – Iraq's demand for a time limit on inspections of presidential compounds.

Eckhard said that time limits were not part of the agreement, but that said details of the deal would first be presented to the Security Council.

The United States and other council members had rejected any deadline.

The U.N. inspectors are trying to determine if Iraq has complied with U.N. orders, issued at the end of the 1991 Persian Gulf War, to destroy all long-range missiles and weapons of mass destruction. That condition must be met before U.N. economic sanctions can be lifted.

Before the announcement, British Foreign Secretary Robin Cook said in London that the United Nations could consider lifting the sanctions if Saddam gives Annan a written promise to comply with the inspections.

"If he would comply ... and if he really is willing this time to cooperate

COMPETITION

Many judges participated in Moot Court during their law school years. Hankin is a self-proclaimed "Moot Court junkie."

Patent attorney Robert Allen, a UCLA Law School graduate, remembered how he decided to become involved in the program on the first day of law school.

"The guy from the Moot Court who spoke at my orientation was so dynamic," he said. "I was so excited that I couldn't wait to get involved."

Allen has judged at the Moot Court competition every semester for five years.

The case that law students argued pertains to a real issue in law that is currently unresolved.

The Moot Court executive board makes up the case every year.

They argued the case of Sarah D. Baker, who filed a civil suit against the hospital which fired her after she was pricked with a needle of an HIV-positive patient and became infected with the virus.

Students argued whether the plaintiff was qualified to perform her job and if she had reasonable accommodations.

States throughout the nation have dealt with the issue of whether health care workers who test HIV-positive should continue their employment.

Students, however, said more about how the competition improved their speaking skills than their knowledge of case law.

"Work on your demeanor," Moot Court Judge Wolpert suggested in comments to an advocate after a round.

Many students reiterated that they learned about etiquette in the courtroom.

"I learned not to be rude to judges," said Heather Moosnick, second-year law student.

"It's better to embarrass yourself in front of your peers than to fall on your face in the real world," she said.

The best advocates from the series of Moot Court competitions, including this one, will compete at the state and national level during the next school year.

"Every year students make the same mistakes and learn from round to round," Hankin said.

"Other law schools spend money hiring professional coaches and offering academic credit. Because UCLA is a state school and competitive academically, students are not as well trained as at other schools," he said.

"This year UCLA came in second overall (at the Western Regional competitions). That truly attests to the fact that the students are doing a good job," he said.

Efforts at that time to enact legislation were thwarted by dual filibusters. McConnell, Lott and most other Republicans refused to allow a vote on the measure drafted by McCain and Democratic Sen. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.).

At the same time, they proposed legislation to require organized labor to obtain the written consent of their members before spending compulsory union dues on political campaigns.

Democrats promptly labeled that a "poison pill" and mounted a filibuster of their own.

In the end, neither side got the 60 votes needed to advance its proposal and the legislation was shelved.

> The struggle over union political activity has become a critical element of campaign reform.

The McCain-Feingold bill, backed by all 45 Senate Democrats and a handful of Republicans, would ban unregulated "soft money" to national political parties from corporations, labor unions and individuals. It also provides fresh curbs on advertisements that attack candidates but escape regulation because they are presented as "issue ads" not covered by existing election law.

While supporters of the measure say changes are necessary to curtail abuses of the current system, some Republicans argue they infringe on the Constitution.

"Be it bumper stickers on your car, yard signs on your law ... or a voluntary contribution of your own hard-earned money to the candidates of party of your choosing – these are all constitutionally protected means of participation in our democracy," McConnell said Saturday in his radio address.

Recent public opinion polling offers no hint of a groundswell of support for the measure that McCain and Feingold have advocated for years.

"It's not an issue the public lists when asked what they think is important," concedes Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.). At the same time, he said, "when asked, they say, 'We don't think you guys are going to do it, but you sure should.'"

The struggle over union political activity has become a critical element of campaign reform.

Republicans complain that organized labor uses compulsory union dues to fund campaigns against the very GOP candidates that rank-and-file union workers support.

weapon.

Leavitt was released from jail Saturday night on his own recognizance.

Although the anthrax vaccine is legal and safe, the charges were still pending against the men. Leavitt's attorneys said federal prosecutors should drop the charges. Harris' attorney did not return calls for comment over the weekend.

Leavitt's attorneys contend he had no intention of using the material as a weapon, but was instead planning to use it to test an unorthodox disease-killing machine he was considering buying for $2 million from a man who would become an FBI informant.

That informant, Ronald Rockwell, has said he turned in Leavitt and Harris last week when Leavitt claimed to possess military-grade anthrax, which could kill thousands of people. Leavitt's attorneys said Rockwell is a con artist who double-crossed Leavitt and Harris when the deal to buy the machine turned sour.

Leavitt has a fire safety supply company in Las Vegas and has also been involved in nontraditional research seeking cures for AIDS and multiple sclerosis.

Leavitt's friends said they were relieved that he was released from jail.

"I just knew that whatever it was, he wasn't doing what they said he was doing," said Jeff Buynak, who rents a small one-story house from Leavitt. "I was hoping that they would find what I know about him. He's a good, honest citizen and works hard."

DIXON

He claims he was never subject to severe treatment.

"I was exposed to different extremes and types of environments, but I never really encountered institutionalized racism," Dixon said.

"I went to UCLA back in 1993 to start a Family Medicine Practice Residency, and I kind of got the hint that it wasn't really the liberal school that they played themselves up to be," he said. "I also felt like I was being overly criticized and scrutinized."

The Department of Family Medicine's program lasts for three years. After the first year, interns become eligible to receive their medical license from the state board.

Dixon was terminated two months before receiving his certificate, which would have enabled him to get his medical license.

According to Lomax, the mistakes the university is claiming resulted in Dixon's dismissal are typical of first-year interns.

However, according to Robinson, when the School of Medicine admits students into the residency program, they intend to see those students through completion.

"We try very hard to keep people in the program (and) we admit people with the expectation that they will complete the program," he said.

"We only have a limited number of residency positions available, and we always have more applicants than positions," Robinson said, adding there are usually 580 residency positions to be filled.

He added that it is highly uncommon for residents to be terminated.

Although she expects the case to be resolved this year, Lomax said that the longer the case takes, the further Dixon will be from his goal.

"For almost four years now, he has been doing menial jobs," Lomax said.

"He didn't exactly go through all this training to become a taxi driver."

AGREEMENT

and not continue to deceive and delay, that (lifting the sanctions) could be done in the fairly near future," Cook said on British Broadcasting Corp. radio.

The talks began after Annan arrived Friday in a visit seen as a last-ditch attempt to resolve the crisis peacefully.

Previous sticking points had included the composition of teams that would inspect the sites. France and Russia have proposed that diplomats accompany inspectors from the U.N. Special Commission, which is in charge of the inspections.

Television footage showed Annan greeting Saddam, who was dressed in a dark, double-breasted suit, and Aziz, who wore a military uniform.

Annan and his eight-member team negotiated with Iraqi officials around the clock Saturday in a series of meetings that ended at 2 a.m. The talks resumed later Sunday morning at the Iraqi Foreign Ministry. After that, Annan met Saddam.

In a commentary Sunday, the newspaper Al-Thawra, which reflects the thinking of the ruling Arab Baath Socialist Party, called the demand for unrestricted access "illogical and unrealistic."

Iraq maintains that granting such access to the very homes of the president trample on its dignity and national sovereignty.

Baghdad also says it has destroyed the proscribed weapons.

They describe as "paycheck protection" their proposal to ban this, and McConnell argued strongly for it in his Republican radio address. "Millions of Americans currently see a portion of each paycheck confiscated by labor unions and used – against the workers' will – to advance a political agenda," he said. "This is wrong and must be stopped."

Efforts to forge a compromise on the issue of union dues faltered last fall, but Snowe has recently been working to rekindle that effort.

Her proposal requires speedy disclosure of contributors to any broadcast commercials targeting specific candidates for office within 30 days of a primary or 60 days of a general election.

In addition, it prohibits the use of union or corporate funds for such ads. It would "simply require funding to come from sources traditionally relied upon for campaign purposes – PACs (political action committees) or individual, voluntary donors," according to a summary of the legislation.

fully support this bill," she said.

MacLeod noted that if Wilson supports the measure, it has a better chance of passing.

She insisted that even if the bill does not pass, it may force UCs to hold off implementation until deliberations on the bill are complete.

MacLeod also claimed that Knight is a bigot.

"Senator Knight is homophobic, our equivalent of Jesse Helms. He believes homosexuals should have no rights," MacLeod said.

Many advocates say that Knight's new bill is just discrimination.

Several years ago Knight authored a bill that would have voided out-of-state gay marriages in California.

Knight's office insisted that Knight's motivations are based purely on public opinion and not bigotry.

Restoring the guiding principles of ASUCLA

MISSION: Association has recently been failing to deliver the services it was originally created for

Over time, things are lost. Guiding principles or goals are sometimes forgotten through the years. Apparently, the leaders of the student's association have forgotten the true meaning and mission of ASUCLA, since it hardly seems to serve the purpose it was created to carry out. ASUCLA stands for the Associated Students of UCLA, not the Associated Stores of UCLA, as it currently appears.

In 1919, students formed an association to assist and support the needs of the student body. ASUCLA created a mission statement: "to satisfy the needs and wants of its constituents by providing products, services and facilities in a student-centered organization that values participatory decision-making."

What we want are services helping students, such as a textbook library or computing services in the student union. What we need is the return of student lounges which have been converted to office spaces students have no access to. What we need is to restore the "student-centered organization" ASUCLA was meant to be, not the money-driven corporation it has become.

Ackerman Union opened in 1961 to serve as the central student union. Primary purposes of a student union are to bring students together in a relaxing and social environment and to provide several services to students in one central location. Ackerman Student Union housed a bowling alley many years ago, as well a travel agency and lots of lounge space for students.

However, in the 1990s, amidst a financial crisis, ASUCLA began looking for a way to cover its losses.

Enter the new and improved Ackerman Union of 1997 – a shopping mall of UCLA logo-bearing clothing, and of course the Clinique counter. The new Ackerman reflected the new ASUCLA – a corporation hungry to get out of the red.

But while the new student union boasted of a huge new UCLA Store (the envy of many other college campuses), Ackerman was stripped of meeting areas, study lounges and a social core. With more shopping areas and restaurant space than lounges and recreational rooms, the union may as well be renamed Westwood Shopping Galleria.

What ever happened to helping and providing services to students rather than blatantly scamming students with overpriced paraphernalia and brand name merchandise?

Contrary to what's stated in the mission statement, ASUCLA yields little, if any, benefit to students, aside from providing grossly overpriced merchandise. A student union should be a social center for college students. Other campuses have pool tables, ping-pong tables and relaxing rooms in which to study and socialize. What ever happened to our travel agency and our reading rooms?

The student union, and students, would reap more benefits if offered child care and counseling, computer rooms and a textbook library similar to USAC's Booklending program.

As far as social activities, Ackerman could stage dancing and karaoke for leisure, even fireplaces and big sofas for studying and socializing. The student union needs to be reclaimed by the students and for the students, not by money hungry businesses and franchises.

ASUCLA needs to be reminded of their purpose and before increasing student fees for useless causes that cater to only a select minority of big-spenders, they should put the money to good use – a student union that we can enjoy without doling out cash we're already strapped for.

Vision of the future

Chancellor Carnesale talks about some of his experiences at UCLA and what lies ahead

PATIL ARMENIAN

Chancellor Albert Carnesale discusses his plans for UCLA.

By Adam Yamaguchi
Daily Bruin Senior Staff

At the helm of a world renowned institution of over 35,000 students sits one man – Chancellor Albert Carnesale. He's responsible for leading the university into the next century, ready to tackle the many obstacles set to challenge UCLA in the coming years. Perhaps most prominent among them is life after Proposition 209. The university must confront a host of other issues, such as securing adequate funds in the face of dwindling funding support from the state and increasing costs of operating, and upholding and improving the quality of education at UCLA. In a recent interview with The Bruin, Carnesale discussed his view of the university.

In the Loop is a question-and-answer session with people who shape our lives

When the UC Regents were in the process of appointing the next chancellor for UCLA, two things were usually associated with you: your previous position at Harvard and your fund raising capacity. Fund raising was looked upon as one of the most significant things. How important is it for UCLA to solicit funds from private donors, and is privatization in line with the mission of a public university?

Certainly it is in line with the mission of a public university. Public universities, for some time now, have relied upon sources of revenue other than the state in which they find themselves. The extent to which public universities are soliciting private support is greater than it has been in the past. Insofar as the fundamental values of academic freedom are concerned, those values are held just as deeply in private universities as they are in public universities, and they do indeed constrain the kinds of gifts one would accept and might not accept. There is a need to be willing to say no to some gifts where you feel they might interfere with academic freedom or with the ability of the university to perform its mission, which for a public university is not only teaching and research but public service as well. The state provides approximately 20 percent of UCLA's income. So we are more dependent that in the past on alternative sources. Most of that money is given for specific purposes that we deem to be important to meet our specific needs.

Your previous experience at Harvard was looked at both positively and negatively as far as your ability to fulfill the duties expected at UCLA. Some were concerned that because of your experience at Harvard, a private university, you were not equipped to deal with issues confronting a public university. And others pointed to your accomplishments at Harvard as proof of your abilities to manage a university. What similarities and differences have you encountered here?

My experience in the public sector is not as limited as it may be perceived. I spent nine years at North Carolina State University. My Ph.D. is from North Carolina State and I was on faculty at North Carolina State and I was an administrator there. I spent a few years in government. And most of my career at Harvard was as professor in the school of government and my field was public policy, and the chair that I held was the professor of public policy and administration so what I studied was primarily public institutions. And finally I became dean of the John F. Kennedy School of Government, which was this broad spectrum of public institutions and not-for-profit institutions. So while it's true that I was at a private university, most of my academic career has been engaged in public policy and public institutions. Secondly, major research universities have more in common than is different. The vast majority of things are similar. To me the most striking difference is the degree of public support for UCLA. The people in Los Angeles care deeply about UCLA whether they went to UCLA or not, whether their kids are in UCLA or not. They want to be involved in it and they want UCLA to be more involved in the community. Private universities' alumni feel loyal to it but others look at it primarily as an employer.

Do you feel the university has been politicized through regent appointments? Is there a danger in entrusting power in a board which isn't reflective of students and their concerns?

Almost every university, public or private, has a board of trustees or a board of regents. It is rare that the body is reflective of the students. The idea of those bodies is the long-term interests of the university, as opposed to students who have the shortest time horizon. I consider it my responsibility to have the long term in mind. I don't believe that in itself is a danger. But that's to be separated from politicization. I think that having a body of people who are not employees or students at the university but care about the uni-

UCLA bids teary farewell to Katie

TRIBUTE: Pauley Pavilion manager, former student dies of brain cancer at 36

By John Sandbrook

UCLA lost its princess last week. There was no royal family presiding, no Elton John song at the memorial service, no worldwide television coverage. But for the 600 or so faculty, staff and students who said our goodbyes to our princess last Friday in Pauley Pavilion, the sense of loss and sadness we felt at losing such a wonderful 36-year-old mother to brain cancer will be not long forgotten.

Our princess was Katie. That single word has been for years a magical name around UCLA for hundreds, if not thousands of us. Her full name was Katherine McCarthy Abbott. But only one word was necessary to describe her: Katie. She was (and always will be, in spirit) the manager of Pauley Pavilion and of the Recreation and Services Facilities Office. But more than anything else, she was a Bruin.

Like so many of us who work at UCLA, she was a Bruin her entire adult life. She came to UCLA at age 18 and graduated in four years. Her love for the campus and for all of us prompted her to remain here, working as a student supervisor in the newly-opened Wooden Center in 1983 and gradually becoming assistant manager (and then manager) of Pauley Pavilion.

Katie loved UCLA and she loved all of us. She loved Pauley Pavilion. She loved all those who walked through "her" building. She took care of all of us, from the most skilled varsity athletes and demanding coaches to the most unskilled intramural and recreational enthusiasts to the fans sitting in the seats for the games and performances.

No task was too large for her to take on. Her enthusiasm and happiness in helping those who approached her with a problem or request was unique. Her ability to persuade so many of us to help her resolve a problem was legendary. Her smile was magnetic. Her charm was beyond description. And, beneath it all, everyone knew that her love for all of us motivated us to feel the same way about her.

There were a lot of stiff upper lips in Pauley Pavilion last Friday at her memorial service. From the electricians and plumbers at the facilities division, to the campus fire marshall, to the coaches, to faculty, staff and students who worked with her or for her.

A lot of the men and women I have worked with for decades had moist eyes, knowing that magical smile and voice and hug will never be coming from her again.

> Hundreds of us watched last Friday as Katie's own princess, her daughter Lauren, 4, and her husband Mike, said their own goodbyes.

How a young woman could develop brain cancer at age 31, successfully fight it off through a year of difficult treatment while raising her newborn daughter, and then have it recur again as she turned 35 ... there is no explanation for that.

And her last year with us was spent in a very difficult time, but always with her giving support to everyone around her without complaint.

With heavy hearts, hundreds of us watched last Friday as Katie's own princess, her daughter Lauren, 4, and her husband Mike, said their own goodbyes to Katie. And we all said goodbye to Katie, feeling something that I don't think any of us will forget for a long time to come. There is a new spirit that is now part of Pauley Pavilion and its legacy. It will be there for many of us whenever we walk in that building again and remember that smile. That spirit will continue to be known by one word: Katie.

Service Collaboration Networking Awareness

Conference

Get to the Heart of the Matter:
Why community service needs you and why you need community service.

Keynote Speaker: Senator Tom Hayden

UCLA Ackerman Grand Ballroom
Saturday, February 28, 1998
9 AM - 4 PM

In its second year, the UCLA Community Service Conference strives to educate students about the importance of community service and provide current volunteers with a further understanding of community needs. In addition, the conference aims to provide a forum for those involved in community service to discuss and collaborate on issues related to the community. Finally, the wide variety of our speakers will provide numerous opportunities for students to network. In our changing society it is time for students to take a stand and "get to the heart of the matter!"

IN THE LOOP

versity having an oversight function and also thinking about the future is quite valuable. What we worry about most is three things that should be decided within the university. First is what we teach, second is to whom we teach, and third is who teaches it. That is the holy trinity of academia. It is very rare that the regents have been involved – not never – but it is very rare and it was where they felt a compelling interest to do so.

As far as politics go, let's go back to the regent meeting held here last November, when Gov. Pete Wilson made last minute appointments to try to swing the regents' vote. There, politics interfered with university policy.

That's university policy. Notice it didn't get at the holy trinity. It didn't get at the things that, as chancellor, are at the forefront in my mind and the recommendation made by the president of UC was upheld.

You've opened your office to students and invited them to town hall meetings. Have students responded?

Yes, certainly. Each time we've had far more students show up than we were able to accommodate. Generally we've made 10 minute appointments. It's extraordinarily useful to me. It's very important to know what's on students' minds.

You may not be able to handle everything on a case-by-case basis but are these concerns brought elsewhere?

Most of the time students raise issues that are important on behalf of students. A student who comes in to talk about the university generally – that's an opportunity for me to ask the questions, 'what do you like least, what do you like most? What are the things you think I should be concerned with? What do you think I should be doing?'

Do you having a working relationship with USAC President Kandea Mosely and GSA President Andrew Westall?

We get together from time to time and any time they've ever asked to see me I've always seen them and I've met with the council. I asked both of them to serve on the advisory committee for the selection of the executive vice chancellor and both accepted.

UCLA's always under construction. It may be necessary but it's disruptive.Where are the priorities?

It's important to note that most of the construction is seismic. The overwhelming majority stems from life and safety issues. The second piece is of facilities for student living. The next big project that's coming up is the new medical center. It will be a substantial project and you can see some of it already. The parking facility is being built under the soccer field and we're having to knock down the parking facility where the hospital is going to be. It's important that we minimize the inconvenience.

UCLA is well-known for two things: diversity of the student body and accessibility. With Proposition 209 taking effect for undergraduates this fall, how do we maintain diversity and how what can outreach programs accomplish?

Well we'll soon find out. This is one of our very highest priorities and I believe what you characterized about UCLA is correct that it is known for its diversity and accessibility and it is known throughout the nation and the world for that, not just here. UCLA more than any other university destroyed the myth that diversity is achieved at the expense of quality. Mostly we're working on the short run since this is, as you said, the first year the admissions process for undergraduates is affected by Proposition

209. There are three stages. The first part is doing our best to ensure that minority students continue to apply to the university, that they not feel suddenly unwanted here. The second is the admissions process itself. Third will be recruitment of those who are admitted – to do our very best to convince them that not only are they wanted but needed at UCLA. The first part – the applications part – is now behind us. The number of applications to UCLA went up again and exceeded 32,000, the most of any campus in the UC system and I believe of any university anywhere. Secondly with regard to minority groups there seems to be virtually no effect of Proposition 209. The trends that we were seeing before 209 continue. We do appear to have overcome any psychological impact of 209 or SP-1 where minority groups might have felt unwelcome. Next will be admissions which we have less control over. The the law precludes us from using race, ethnicity or gender as a factor but I want to make clear that we don't simply use grade point average and SAT score. We never have. We've always had two people read every file and take into account what obstacles this student has overcome, what leadership potential do they have and a whole host of other factors and we will continue to do that and it remains to be seen what it will do to admissions. The third part is psychological again and that's where we can work hard. All of us, not just administrators – faculty, students, alumni, particularly those with relationships with underrepresented minorities have to convince those students who are admitted that we need them at UCLA.

One of the keys to maintaining accessibility and diversity is affordability. With dwindling state support what's the priority for keeping fees down?

I think the way of thinking about the priorities is financial aid. That's the key to accessibility, and it's more the key than the fees themselves. There are several ways to maintain accessibility. One is to keep fees low for everybody, in which case those who could afford to pay much more pay a very low fee, but the university would be strapped for resources. Another way is to have fees increase moderately and have the people who can afford to pay it pay, and have financial aid available for those who don't. That assures accessibility but also provides the funds needed to have an excellent university. If the fees get too low you have accessibility to a university that is going to decline in quality. We would love to be able is to provide full need aid that any student who is admitted to UCLA would be able to afford to come here, either because their family could afford it or because there was adequate financial aid availability.

What are your goals for UCLA?

What I said on the day of the announcement of my appointment and thereafter is that one of the things that excited me about coming to UCLA is that I believe that UCLA is an excellent university, clearly among the very top-ranked public universities and that UCLA is well-positioned to be a great university, period. By a great university I meant one that would be recognized around the world, that when people name great universities, that list has got to be more than five but it can't be much more than 10 and that UCLA should be on that list. I said I believed we were well-positioned for three reasons. UCLA was already excellent, has great resources and enormous public support. My time here has not only confirmed those observations but has put a lot more flesh on the bones. I know a lot more now and they've strengthened my view and sense that the vision can be achieved.

Former skateboarder chases Hollywood jobs

FILM: Lee's shift from athlete to actor succeeds with wide range of roles

By Aimee Phan
Daily Bruin Staff

The ups and downs of careening on a skateboard are as unpredictable and risky as an acting career. So when Jason Lee decided to leave professional skateboarding to give Hollywood a try, he didn't think it would be a hard transition.

"It was seven years of professional skateboarding," Lee says. "I had been skateboarding since I was five, and I did so much traveling and competing that I eventually wore out of that, which is natural. I fulfilled what I needed to fulfill and left on good terms with myself."

While this risky move may seem nuts to some people, Lee proved them wrong by winning his first movie role, in Kevin Smith's "Mallrats," within a year. And with his critically acclaimed role in last year's "Chasing Amy" and the release of his new movie, "Kissing a Fool," the same success Lee experienced in skateboarding is happening to him in Hollywood.

Dressed in a brown suit and sporting an uncharacteristic bushy beard, Lee explains his rather mature appearance for a film role in Tony Scott's upcoming "Enemy of the State" with Will Smith and Gene Hackman.

It's hard to believe that only three years ago, this mature young actor once was performing ollies on a half-pipe at skating competitions.

Lee's first film role came early for him after meeting with the casting director of "Mallrats" and impressing director Smith with his initial readings. Since he had no previous acting experience, Lee remembers the day of final auditions as nerve-wracking and agonizingly long but eventually paying off when he left with the role. Lee recalls the moment in vivid detail.

"I was so delirious that day since I hadn't eaten because I was so nervous," Lee says. "I didn't even think to think I was getting the role because I was the most amateur one there. Finally, at the end of the day, I was the last one there, and Kevin brought me into his office and said, 'The part is yours.' And I had someone bring me Carl's Jr., and I was mid-bite into my cheeseburger, and I just stared at him. I was so happy."

And although the movie didn't do very well critically or commercially, Lee values his "Mallrats" experience for introducing him to the daily grind of a working actor with so many rehearsals.

"For somebody's first movie, a Kevin Smith movie is a great one to have because the writing is so important and everything. The timing and the pacing has to be perfect," Lee says. "To go right into your first movie and be confronted with that much rehearsal and attention to detail and to have to get to that point where it works, was a huge feat for me."

Obviously, Lee's hard work in "Mallrats" impressed Smith enough to cast him in his next film, "Chasing Amy." Playing the homophobic loudmouth friend who tries to get between Ben Affleck and Joey Lauren Adams, Lee impressed the critics enough to be nominated for an Independent Spirit Award.

He also caught the attention of "Kissing a Fool" director Doug Allen, who showed Lee's work to his longtime friend and "Kissing" co-star David Schwimmer. They both agreed that Lee would be ideal in the leading role of Jay and sent the script to his agent. Even auditioning was a wonderful plus and an incentive to participate in this project.

Jason Lee plays a shy, lovelorn writer in "Kissing A Fool."

"Technically, this was my first offer, which was really flattering because it was about getting future work because of hard work that I had put into something else," Lee says. "For a $250,000 movie like 'Chasing Amy' to get so much recognition that other people are wanting me to bring some of that into their scripts was a really good feeling."

After "Kissing a Fool," Lee will be rejoining Smith in March to shoot his next film, "Dogma," a religious comedy that also includes "Chasing Amy" actor Affleck in addition to Matt Damon, Chris Rock and Linda Fiorentino. Regarding whether he may be limited by only acting with Smith, Lee says he feels privileged to continue working with the director.

"No matter what anyone says, Kevin and I are friends, and if he wants me to work with him, then I want to work with him," Lee says. "I'll work on Kevin Smith films and I'll work on other films. There's no problem with that at all."

And since Lee has never had to deal with the struggling-actor syndrome, he appreciates his good fortune of making the transition from skateboarding to acting so easily.

"I didn't have to worry about any downtime and getting a (real) job," Lee says. "I wonder sometimes what (would have happened) if I didn't get 'Mallrats.' I don't know what I would be doing."

Fools fall in love

David Schwimmer, Jason Lee and Mili Avital find chemistry and versatility in their new roles

A young woman is torn between a sensitive writer and a macho, womanizing sportscaster. This sounds like a typical romantic comedy. But look at who's playing who.

In "Kissing A Fool," which opens on Friday, David Schwimmer, best known as sympathetic and vulnerable Ross on the hit show "Friends," plays the philandering ladies' man Max. Jason Lee, who was such an obnoxious loudmouth in Kevin Smith's "Chasing Amy," is the emotional and lovelorn Jay.

While audiences may be jolted at the actors' character switches in this independent comedy from first-time director Doug Ellin, both actors relished the chance to break out of their stereotypes.

When longtime friend Ellin first approached Schwimmer about participating in "Kissing a Fool," the actor says he had no doubts over which man he would play.

"Doug said, 'Read Max; you're Max.' There was no question," Schwimmer recalls. "He's known me for a long time. I've done three short films with him already, and in one of them, I play a character similar to this guy. He knew that I had no desire to play a character that close to Ross as I play him eight months out of the year."

For Lee, starring as the quieter leading man gave him the opportunity to play someone who was more neurotic and self-aware than his previous characters.

"It was an interesting challenge," Lee says. "Jay's more soft-spoken, and he's trying to figure things out without hurting people. He's a lot more introverted, whereas Banky was more extroverted. But I liked both approaches, and it was interesting to play similar confusing characters but treat it differently."

Schwimmer agrees. "It feels good. I hope (audiences) like it. I guess I expect that the first couple of minutes, they'll be like, 'Whoa, what's going on ?' My only hope is that they're so caught up in the story and the characters that they leave the theater realizing that, 'Oh, that was Schwimmer.'"

"Kissing a Fool," which Universal is distributing, revolves around three unique and successful young people trying to find love in Chicago.

When Jay sets up his new editor Sam (famous Israeli actress Mili Avital) with his best friend Max, the new couple instantly hit it off, get engaged and move in together

Makeup, style should express individuals, not social taboos

COLUMN: Aucoin uses 'Making Faces' to show that originality is key

Soon you will be studying my mug shot very closely. You will think, "Did it work?" "Can I trust her advice?" "What color lipstick is she wearing?" (darn black and white newspaper).

Cheryl Klein

Because I'm about to do something that would horrify every little riot grrl faction in my being. I'm going to write about makeup.

And my inner riot grrl will just have to deal with it because I'm about to make the case that she's not necessarily in conflict with my inner cheerleader, my inner artist and my very outward English major.

The catalyst for all this is Kevyn Aucoin's "Making Faces." If you're even slightly more up on the world of fashion than I am (which means you've changed your hairstyle since the eighth grade), then you know he's that guy who was on "House of Style" a bunch of times and is famous for making celebrities look like other celebrities.

But I only heard of him as of last week, when my grandma presented a copy of the book to my sister, my mom and me. "So this is female bonding?" I thought when she initially gushed about Aucoin's skills with a mascara wand. "How disturbing."

I should have trusted her though. This is the same woman who traveled out of state to trick-or-treat (she chose trick) at her ex-husband's house and can make cream cheese into 15 different dips. The book is cool. Kevyn Aucoin is endearingly, glamorously cool. And makeup might not be the social parasite I once thought it was.

Conventional wisdom – which for me is a rather unconventional series of deconstructionist, upper-division English classes – says that if I want to open my own doors and drive a stick shift and be taken seriously, I have to think of makeup as a fascist tool of oppression. I'm not completely convinced that it's not. Our culture basically says, "Nice face. Now cover it up." This attitude points to dishonesty about the self, "lookism" and a tendency to exoticize. These are all words bandied about passionately among my revolutionary classmates.

Last quarter I took an honors collegium class called "Masculinity, Patriarchy and Sexuality" with the very eloquent, very nurturing Professor Dee Bridgewater. We talked about all those nifty buzz words, and when the topic of fashion came up, I dredged up some

BEN FOLDS FIVE
"Naked Baby Photos"

Ben Folds Five, "Naked Baby Photos," (Caroline) OK, first warning: The newest Ben Folds Five album does not contain their massively popular hit, "Brick." Secondly, there are no guitars on this album. It's almost funny that college radio and now alternative rock stations have embraced this piano-heavy, North-Carolina outfit.

Aside from that, "Naked Baby Photos" is a compilation of rarities, live songs and assorted tracks that didn't "make" their other albums. Or, more cynically, it appears indie label Caroline Records is looking to capitalize on the Five's newfound fame. Either way, hardcore Ben-Folds-Five fans should eat this up, and people interested in their pre-"Brick" days should find this odd collection pretty interesting.

The whole album is pretty offbeat and primarily upbeat. From random instrumentals ("Dick Holster") and Beastie Boys-like improvisations ("For Those Of Y'all Who Wear Fannie Packs"), to live versions of older stuff like "Alice Childress" and "Song For the Dumped," Ben Folds Five offer the goods all on one serving that usually finds its way as B-sides to singles.

Most of it takes on that schmaltzy, '70s pop aura that helped make Billy Joel and Elton John popular, but the Five don't exactly mirror either of those acts. "Naked Baby Photos" isn't exactly a masterpiece, but for those who dig piano-pop, it's worth a listen. Mike Prevatt B-

Bush, "Deconstructed," (Trauma/Interscope) Remix albums, much like outtake and B-side albums, seem to always be a cash cow for the bands releasing them. "Deconstructed" is a remix album by the English rock band Bush, co-hosted by 11 different remix specialists like Goldie, Tricky and Mekon. Bush have been multi-platinum sellers of their only two previous releases, "Sixteen Stone" and "Razorblade Suitcase," and on "Deconstructed" they take a different approach to their music by allowing their mainstream rock-songs to be reset in a more electronic style.

On tracks like the radio-friendly "Mouth," the experiment works because the pace of the song rolls along to an ambient electronic style. Lead-singer Gavin Rossdale croons like the pop star that he is and the remix fits nicely under his vocal track merely by not overtaking it. The hit "Swallowed" from "Razorblade Suitcase" is remixed nicely by Goldie and it too works, with a hyper-fast drum loop that edges from right to left channels while the bass drum drops low and the electronics bolster the frantic feel as Rossdale's line "gotta get away from here" gets replayed."

New Order's "In A Lonely Place" is another highlight that captures sonic ambience while providing a leisurely vibe to an otherwise fast-paced album.

Other tracks like "Insect Kin" and "Bonedriven" seem excessively repetitive and uninspired while sounding nothing at all like any aspect of Bush.

Fans who like the Prodigy and Bush will probably get a rise out of "Deconstructed," but those longing for the signature guitar work of Nigel Pulsford will find it lacking. "Deconstructed" is a nice step for Bush, because it makes it clear that they will not be confined to their alt-rock genre. Michael Nazarinia B+

Goldie, "Saturnz Return," (ffrr/Polygram) One of the first names to emerge from the electronica blitz of last year, Goldie represented the best of jungle music. His "Timeless" album turned tight drum and bass into an ephemeral dance melody, with the kids and critics alike eating it up. With the world in his sight, Bjork by his side and the best set of gold teeth this side of England, Goldie was primed to break through in the states. But with his latest double disc attempt, "Saturnz Return," Goldie seems to have lost some edginess from his music.

A musical visionary, Goldie is never short on creative ideas to incorporate with his music. For "Return," Goldie tries to merge classical, R&B, jazz, and drum and bass into a 60-minute epic, taking up the entire first CD. The musical menagerie titled "Mother" must have broken some sort of modern duration record. Give big ups for Goldie's effort in his pursuit to become the 20th-century electronic maestro, but the song lasts 55 minutes too long. Everything that can be said, mixed, sampled and stolen about the tune existed in five minutes of mixing which repeats for an hour.

The second disc included 10 tracks that resembled mini-versions of "Mother." The problem with drum and bass is that constantly repetitious drum layer infesting every track. After a couple of songs, the background arrangements sound the same; the tracks begin to lose their unique rhythm and start to run into each other.

"Digital" breaks the monotony with collaboration between Goldie and rapper KRS-One. These two music veterans throw out a great concoction, embodying KRS-One's rap slinging over the best drum and bass Goldie mixed for the album. It proved that good rap doesn't need to pilfer from the old school stuff. However, it's slim pickings after "Digital," as tracks turn into a blur of sound. But at least he still has cool teeth. Trinh Bui C

Jolene, "In The Gloaming," (Sire) Why are there so many boring rock bands appearing out of the woodwork? Hootie and the Blowfish remain commendable for the power of their vocals and occasional creativity, but there's a definite reason why their popularity remains limited to the VH-1 crowd. Jolene falls in this category. "In The Gloaming" equals Hootie plus Wallflowers minus real talent.

In their second release, Jolene falls short of mainstream standards. To be truly mainstream you need to be more than catchy and simplistic. You need a dab of energy and just a little originality. Songs like "Exhibit" and "Pull the Weight, Virginia" are little more than an awkward combination of country tunes and folk-rock rejects

The album sounds like one long song rather than a compilation of different rhythms. The same mediocre melody is regurgitated in song after song. Two noteworthy exceptions include the first track, "Pensacola," and the last, "20th Century Pause." They provide a strong frame, but what about the other 12 songs? Unfortunately, they remain unbearably dull. If you need some background music while you sleep, enjoy! Michelle Zubiate C-

Armenians hope exhibit aims fulfilled

ART: Association's goal was to rouse empathy, teach culture's history

By Megan Dickerson
Daily Bruin Contributor

"Every Armenian has a genocide story to tell," says Ardashes Kasskhian, a fourth-year history student and artist who spearheaded "The Armenian Experience in Art," an exhibit of paintings which closed Friday in Kerckhoff Art Gallery.

Using both subtle and not-so-subtle images of the 1915 Armenian genocide, the two-week long exhibit attempted to create an illustrative biography of Armenians in America.

The exhibit, which was sponsored by the UCLA Armenian Students Association (ASA), featured five Armenian artists of varying ages and styles. The paintings that lined the walls of the small gallery next to Kerckhoff Coffeehouse ranged in genre from religious iconography to Armenian landscapes.

Kassakhian, who in addition to his role as a featured artist is president of the ASA, says that each painting symbolizes some aspect of the Armenian experience in America. He says the genocide, which was inflicted by the Turks during World War I, plays an important role in Armenian-American Stamp strides back in the act with 'Love Walked In'

FILM: Famous '60s star avoids cliché stereotype by relying on versatility

By Michelle Nguyen
Daily Bruin Contributor

In the 1960s, actor Terence Stamp ("The Adventures of Priscilla, Queen of the Desert") was courted by big guns Frederico Fellini, Peter Ustinov and Ken Loach. But then, as he explains, it was because he was so identified with the '60s, "When the decade ended, I ended with it."

Cut to Terence Stamp, the swami, in orange robes and with hair he had not cut in seven years, living in an ashram in Puna, India. After ending with the decade, he had become a wandering traveler, cutting off all ties with Fellinis and the rest if the world of leading men.

Eight years into his acting sabbatical, he's holding an old-fashioned telegram in his hand in the foothills of Bombay. His long-suffering agent was beckoning him. The telegram was addressed to Clarence Stamp.

"It said would you be prepared to come back to London to meet Richard Donner about the two Superman films with Marlon Brando, and could you stop in Paris to talk to Peter Brook about 'Meetings with Remarkable Men,' and I thought, 'Wow'. This was back in the universe, back in the marketplace. The universe knockin' on my door again, and that was my comeback," Stamp recalls with amused nostalgia.

> "I was getting pissed off that I wasn't getting the Tom Cruise parts."

But it would be a rebirth into a different kind of career.

"I was no longer a star, just a jobbing actor," Stamp explains. He went on to create a niche for himself in roles that stretched his ability. Hence, the '60s Stamp of "Billy Budd" stardom became the Bernadette of "Priscilla Queen of the Desert." Today, Stamp is content to play a non-leading man, as he does in "Love Walked In," a

'The Wedding' illustrates strange type of prejudice

TELEVISION: Second part of miniseries highlights racism in social town

By John Levesque
Seattle Post-Intelligencer

Prejudice, it turns out, is a primary color.

This is the essential message of "The Wedding," a slow-moving but attractive miniseries that adds a whole palette of shading to the traditional portrait of star-crossed lovers.

Shelby Coles (Halle Berry) is the rich girl: beautiful, sheltered, naive. Meade Howell (Eric Thal) is the poor boy: handsome, talented, headstrong. They're deeply in love and rushing blissfully toward marriage when Meade runs square into the complexity of The Oval.

The Oval is a hoity-toity neighborhood of snobs on Martha's Vineyard. Shelby's family has long had a grand home in this enclave of wealthy black families, where every man's jib is cut on the same bias as his exclusionary white counterparts. Appearance counts for everything and substance for nothing in this world, which is why Shelby's sister, Liz (Cynda Williams), eloped rather than stand for a wedding ceremony to which her future in-laws were not invited. They were too dark.

In The Oval people see a multitude of hues, each as subtle as a veiled putdown. The important thing to remember is that, in this odd little circle, the lighter, the better.

Thus, while Liz and Shelby's mother won't mingle with the family of Liz's husband, she's OK with the parents of Meade, who is unmistakably white on the color chart.

The problem with Meade, an uncomplicated, unpretentious jazz musician, is that he's penniless. Yet he gives Corinne a dose of her own hauteur by announcing that his parents won't be attending the wedding. And so the whole fairy tale begins to unravel: Shelby and Meade quarrel; she worries about being a biracial couple when Meade is touring the South; she meets a tall, very dark and handsome man named Lute McNeil (Carl Lumbly), who's renting a summer place across the street; she resists Lute's bold advances but wonders about her feelings for Meade and why, as her father points out, she has "never given the time of day to a single colored fellow who's shown any interest" in her.

This would all be sappy melodrama if it weren't for the intricate backstory provided in Dorothy West's acclaimed novel, which Oprah Winfrey decided to turn into a movie. "The Wedding" is the second of six "Oprah Winfrey Presents" projects she is producing for ABC.

The story springs from Shelby's great-grandmother, known to us only as Gram. Through sometimes confusing flashbacks, we learn that Gram hasn't lived the sort of life she envisioned. She swallowed hard when her only daughter married a black man – the educated son of one of her father's slaves.

> "The Wedding" offers a well-framed view of class and power.

Gram made it her business to be sure that Corinne married right (and light). The prospect of her light-skinned great-granddaughter, Shelby, marrying a white man is enough to make Gram's long life – she is 98 in 1953 – satisfyingly complete.

Still, while not entirely rewarding, "The Wedding" offers a well-framed view of class and power, of pride and prejudice in the '50s that most Americans never witnessed.

Oprah Winfrey likes to say that she wants to make movies that "open our hearts just a little wider." With "The Wedding," she and ABC may open a few minds, too.

TV: "Oprah Winfrey Presents 'The Wedding.'" Starring Halle Berry, Eric Thal, Lynn Whitfield, Carl Lumbly, Shirley Knight and Michael Warren. Showing Sunday and Monday on ABC.

History 1C info and pointed out that before the Enlightenment, both men and women dressed extravagantly (think Robert Downey Jr. in "Restoration"). But the age of reason ushered in fashions based on, you guessed it, reason. Suddenly ruffled collars just didn't make sense for forward-thinking individuals (read: men).

Women squeezed themselves into corsets and ruffles until the '20s. Why do you think that Lucy in "A Tale of Two Cities" (hands down one of the most annoying characters in all of literature) fainted on every other page? Fashion echoes socio-economic status, and it's hard to run for Congress when you're gasping for breath.

But modernism means no frills, function dictates form and, you'd think, the end of makeup. But before Estee Lauder can go completely broke, in steps post-modernism. You know, postmodernism. That all encompassing, multi-cultural, progressive, Bohemian, 25-cent word.

To me, it means that men are going to start wearing makeup.

There. If it happens, I called it. Dennis Rodman, who sported (no pun intended) some very flashy blue eyeshadow at last year's Academy Awards may still be something of an anomaly, but the fact that he's a popular member of a true manly man's profession says something big.

This and Aucoin's book are something of a go-ahead for me, a girl who would be happy to buy a new lipstick every week, even if it meant going without, say, groceries. I opened the book expecting to find a dull, rigid series of guidelines about how to blend foundation and a small European country's worth of skinny white models with a paragraph about how "ethnic is in" next to a picture of a heavily-powdered woman who was maybe one-fourth black.

But Aucoin's first sentence promises, "First of all, let me say that I believe there are no rules." And he follows through. He rambles hilariously about his early experiences with makeup (eating his mother's lipstick), and many of the models he uses are not models at all. They are young, old, fat, thin, black, white, Asian, Indian, Latino, his sisters, his mom, his friends, women and, yes, men.

All this intrigued me. As a person who's contemplated using lip gloss within weeks. But when Max experiences insecurities about his fiancee's faithfulness, he asks Jay to test her and find out if she will cheat on him. But as guilt-ridden Jay spends more time with Sam, he starts to fall for her as well, and soon both men are vying for her affections.

The woman caught in the love triangle is a character as neurotic and confused as her suitors, something that actress Avital appreciated when she first read the script.

> "When I first met David and Jason for my reading ... we had immediate chemistry."
> Mili Avital
> Actress

"I loved that she wasn't a typical girl," Avital says. "She wasn't the girl who just wants to get a boyfriend. Usually when I read scripts, I really get pissed off, like does she really have to wear a miniskirt in the first scene and say nothing throughout the whole film? But here, I liked that she was intellectual and smart and a good example for a modern woman."

One of the primary elements that makes a romantic comedy work is chemistry. Without that certain spark, no matter how good the script is or how pretty the actors look, the movie will bomb. But all the actors agreed that the chemistry between them was obvious from the first days of meeting each other.

"When I first met David and Jason for my reading in this movie – which was my audition – we had immediate chemistry," Avital says. "As soon as we started doing the scene, it immediately worked. It just flew, and I think you really can see the chemistry on the screen."

Schwimmer and Avital have their own theories about exactly what chemistry encompasses but agree that it's a powerful, if at times indescribable, phenomenon.

"I think it's about reacting to someone," Schwimmer says. "In this movie, there are some great reaction shots because I think we're really in the moment and really reacting to each other. Part of my problem with a lot of actors is that I don't believe that they're really listening to each other. Sometimes you have it, sometimes you don't. Sometimes you can manufacture chemistry through editing. But you know when you're acting if you have chemistry with someone or not."

Avital adds, "I don't think there's a reasonable explanation to it. I think it has to do with intuition. But when it's not there, you feel it. Especially in comedy because you're relying so much on timing and relying on responding to each other all the time, so it's extremely important."

But having chemistry doesn't make doing those love scenes any easier.

"It's very technical," Avital says. "I always compare it to action scenes when you have to hit people. You just pretend. I've never really had a hot, steamy love scene but from the little kisses I've had on screen, it's pretty boring."

But while Avital's attitude toward love scenes is mostly apathetic, Lee actively fears and dreads them.

> "There are some great reaction shots because I think we're really ... reacting to each other."
> David Schwimmer
> Actor

"I don't like it," Lee says. "It's very uncomfortable. I try to do as little of it as possible. In this movie, I did it in a scene that didn't even go into the movie. No one was cutting and I moved away and said, 'Cut already! Jesus, you got the kissing part!'" modern film noir. But, at first, he did not make the transition into the world of "jobbing actors" wholeheartedly.

"I was dragged screaming into that," Stamp says frankly. "It wasn't anything I wanted. I was getting pissed off that I wasn't getting the Tom Cruise parts."

He continues, "All of us actors are lazy. I mean I'd love to be in 'X Files' and just be in a nice suit and say the words. But the truth is you have to really work and really stretch yourself, which you never choose to do actually. I don't think leading men choose to do that. They all want to be sort of a Robert Redford and Warren Beatty, get all the good lines, wear the great costumes, get good close-ups."

But the meditations he gathered traipsing through the rice fields of Bali and living in the straw rooms of Kyoto prepared him for the life of an actor who would see intrinsic value in his work.

"The shift happens, and you're no longer doing the work for the possibility of getting an Oscar," Stamp says. "You're doing the work for the work."

He adds, "I'm not beautiful enough. I don't have enough grace to just be Terence Stamp in a great suit the way Cary Grant was, Gary Cooper was. I have to be this actor in whom anyone can mirror their fantasies. I gotta be the perfect mirror. I gotta keep the mirror clean."

He does play a dashing man in a great suit though, in "Love Walked In." The film, costarring Dennis Leary and Aitana Sanchez-Gijon, sees him as hard-shelled millionaire named Fred Moore who falls in love with Vicky Rivas (Sanchez-Gijon), the sensuous lounge singer who is married to her pianist, Jack Hanaway (Leary).

Vicky and Jack are poor and in love, playing in a small unknown bar called the Blue Cat Lounge to make a living. Then Jack's old friend Eddie comes to visit. He is a private investigator and concocts a scheme for Vicky to seduce Moore, a Blue Cat patron, so that he can take photos of them and get commission from Moore's rich and suspicious wife. Moore is an easy target because he has been in a long, loveless marriage which he endures for money.

"What was interesting to me was to be able to convey that hardened shell around his heart, cracking and becoming like wax and kind of melting, and then kind of overwhelming him," Stamp explains.

"(Stamp) always gets below the veneer to the most human level."

"So that he's suddenly seeing things with a totally different perspective," Stamp continues. "He's looking at it with an open heart and he understands that everything else has to be sacrificed, all the money, everything. He comes to this woman unadorned."

Stamp plays the role of a man who makes up the third side of the love triangle, an easily targetable cliché, but as Director Juan J. Campanella explains, "He is someone who can take a character who might in other hands become a cliché and add layers and layers of depth. He always gets below the veneer to the most human level."

Stamp's appears next in "Kiss the Sky," in which he plays a former Amsterdam junkie who becomes a Zen monk named Kozen, a continuation of his experiment in versatility.

FILM: "Love Walked In" is currently playing.

on her eyelids and has used eyeliner on her lips, I find rules rather condescending in general. Plus my nose is more Barbra Streisand than Kate Moss, and I think it's cool when guys wear nail polish (but keep the nails short boys, long is just creepy).

And maybe the fact that Aucoin announced his homosexuality on page one somehow made me question his motives less. I'm not sure if that makes sense, but if he were a heterosexual man, a little part of me would think, "He's just trying to get women to conform to his own personal fantasies." And if he were a woman, while I'd be slightly less suspicious, I'd be tempted to think, "Internalized oppression alert!"

(Makeup is) having fun with your face in a way that requires much less commitment than piercing or tattooing.

But Aucoin had no personal stake, just the pure art of it. (This is very Kantian, take my word for it. Or take English 140A). Makeup, according to Aucoin, the '90s and yours truly, isn't erasing who you are or even enhancing in the traditional sense. It's having fun with your face in a way that requires much less commitment than piercing or tattooing.

This is not a smart-women-can-be-feminine-too argument, though I don't deny that. Fashion as a mode of personal expression has been a human phenomenon ever since Org, or Orga the Cro-Magnon person, decided it was getting a little too chilly to run around the cave naked.

So of all the "Jenny Jones" episodes I've watched (remember my first column of the quarter? No? I'll fill you in by saying that, in addition to being fashion-backward, I watch a lot of stupid TV) the ones that bug me most are the makeover episodes.

Jenny, I know you're trying to help, but you are The Man in talk-show-host's clothing. On "You Wear Too Much Makeup" or whatever they called it, the guests boasted everything from triple-decker pink, purple and green eyeshadow, to '80s-chic magenta lipstick, to various Goth symbols stenciled on their cheeks with black eyeliner.

So Team Jenny took the guests backstage, broke for a commercial, and sent them back out in floral print dresses, Courtney Cox haircuts and brown eyeshadow and soft rose lipstick. They looked ... nice, I guess.

I watched the show knowing that my lipstick is really too dark, and if I weren't so lazy, I'd tweeze my eyebrows. (You're looking at my mug again. Hah! That was taken in the summer, nearly two lipsticks ago. It's only my hair that hasn't changed since junior high).

But I didn't care then and, thank you, Kevyn Aucoin, I care even less now. Because creativity is a much greater asset in the long run than conformity, however "pretty." And if you mix Garden Botanika's Pecan lipstick with a $1, brown eyeliner from some random beauty supply store in Westwood, you get a very creative shade.

Klein is a third-year American literature and culture student. She is happy because she recently found out that while Mac lipstick is outrageously expensive, they don't test on animals. It's all about rationalizing.

ARMENIAN

art. Its importance stems in part because many Armenians arrived in America due to the diaspora, the global scattering of the Armenians after the genocide. It follows in suit that this subject would hit close to home for many of the 600 Armenian students on UCLA's campus, Kasskhian says.

"Armenian art has been profoundly influenced by the genocide," Kassakhian affirms.

This is especially true for Eiffel Nazaryan, an up-and-coming artist whose work highlights the show. A third-year potential studio art student at the University of California, Santa Barbara, Nazaryan came to the United States from Armenia in 1990 and still keeps contacts overseas.

"Being apart from them makes me feel kind of alone," Nazaryan says, his voice slightly accented. "I have to connect to them by studying art and creating art that relates to (the conflict)." Nazaryan's latest works feature Armenian musicians and painters whose lives were torn apart by the genocide.

By bringing to light such figures through his art, Nazaryan seeks to educate and give the viewer a sense of history and empathy.

"That's one of the ways that I can talk to people in general and tell them about the Armenian question, about the genocide and about things that have happened to the Armenian in history," Nazaryan says. "It's like advertisement in the form of art."

> "I hope people can see through the art ... to the vibrant culture."
> Ardashes Kasskhian
> Artist

Paintings by the other artists detailed Armenian flowers, abandoned churches, and illuminated manuscripts and snowy Armenian landscapes. One of the artists is Nazaryan's uncle, while another is a student still overseas.

Kassakhian says that showing a variety of styles by artists of different ages was the best way to give the general public a glimpse into Armenian culture.

"I hope people can see through the art ... to the vibrant culture," Kassakhian says. "The Armenian people, although small (in number) to some, are a vibrant community and contribute to every field, not only art. This (exhibit) is the easiest way we can show that, physically."

The ASA is planning on presenting another exhibit, a visual timeline of genocide in conjuntion with Jewish and Greek organizations on campus. In the meantime, the group meets once a month to network with Armenian professionals and other members of the community.

As this particular exhibit closed, Kassakhian and Nazaryan hoped that all visitors to the exhibit were able to connect with the Armenian experience in America through the visual images displayed.

"We had a reception and somebody asked me the question, 'How do you relate to genocide?,'" Nazaryan says. "'How do you create something about genocide that you haven't even experienced?' And I was like, okay, watch TV, sit there for like five minutes and see what's going on, the killing, the conflict in the world ... obviously, you can tell people are getting killed, getting hurt. The genocide is not something that happened millions of years ago ... Just listen to the survivors, and you just can't walk away and say 'No, that must have been a mistake.'"

How to Write an Effective Ad
- Start your ad with the merchandise you are selling. This makes it easier for readers to quickly scan the ads and locate your items.
- Always include the price of your item. Many classified readers simply do not respond to ads without prices.
- Avoid abbreviations—make you ad easy for readers to understand.
- Place yourself in the reader's position, ask what you would like to know about the merchandise, and include that in the ad. Include such information as brand names, colors and other specific descriptions.

The ASUCLA Communications board fully supports the University of California's policy on nondiscrimination; no medium shall accept advertisements which present persons of any origin, race, sex, or sexual orientation in a demeaning way or imply that they are limited to positions, capabilities, roles, or status in society. Neither the Daily Bruin nor the the ASUCLA Communications Board has investigated any of the services advertised or the advertisements represented in this issue. Any person believing that an advertisement in this issue violated the Board's policy on nondiscrimination stated herein should communicate complaints in writing to the Business Manager, Daily Bruin, 118 Kerckhoff Hall, 308 Westwood Plaza, Los Angeles, CA 90024. For assistance with housing discrimination problems, call the UCLA Housing Office at (310) 825-4271 or call the Westside Fair Housing Office at (310) 475-9671. Classified ads also appear on-line at http://www.dailybruin.ucla.edu. Placement on-line is offered as a complimentary service for customers and is not guaranteed.

M. BASKETBALL

make a shot against the much bigger Devils.

The Bruins shot a dismal 26.2 percent in the first half mainly because they could not finish off second, third and sometimes even fourth looks.

Meanwhile, the Devils won the game because of perimeter shooting more than by pounding the ball inside, shooting a 53.2 clip.

Duke made 15 three-pointers; junior Trajan Langdon shot 11 of 16 from the field including six threes and scored a game-high 34 points.

In last year's Bruin victory over the Blue Devils, Langdon didn't score in the first half. This season, Langdon had 21 points by intermission.

UCLA would attempt to come back from its 57-33 halftime deficit in the second act, but the task was made even harder when Henderson picked up his fourth foul with 18:22 left. He was called for an offensive foul – his third of the game.

Henderson, whose armband had the number 34 written on it, was clearly frustrated by the referees calls.

"I knew we were in the ACC and we're from the Pac-10 and we might get a couple of calls against us, but to make it that obvious, it's just not right," said Henderson who had 14 points in his 18 minutes. "(The refs) definitely determined the outcome. It was already going to be a tough game for us. And with Jelani gone, I'm the backbone and to take the backbone out really hurts the team."

But what also hurt UCLA was its lack of depth. Duke had 10 players play more than 10 minutes in the game; the Devils' starting five averaged only 23.4 minutes.

"We are a fresh basketball team," Duke head coach Mike Krzyzewski said.

"We never lost our legs," said Henderson "They were bringing in five guys at a time and I knew eventually we were going to wear down, and they were going to keep going strong, and I think that shows in the score."

Kris Johnson led the Bruins with 20 points. Davis added 18 before fouling out with 4:03 to go, and Bailey had 17 points and nine rebounds.

"Hats go off to Duke," Johnson said. "They played an awesome game."

BASEBALL

Part of the reason for the huge arbitration increases has been the owners' success at holding down salaries of players in their first three seasons, when they aren't eligible for arbitration. The salaries then increase dramatically when players are in arbitration for the first time.

Overall, the average for players in arbitration is still short of the record of $2,091,187, set in 1994 before the 7 1/2-month strike.

match and we're very inexperienced so that combination ... that's why it was so lopsided tonight."

It was definitely a strange sight to see on Friday night.

On the Bruin bench was Mark Williams, Moselle, Tom Stillwell, Taliaferro, Robins and Naeve. It wasn't that the starters were struggling. If anything, it was just the opposite.

The starting lineup for UCLA had just bageled Cal State San Bernardino so Scates decided to insert the entire second team into the match.

> The second stringers found their rhythm and dominated the (second) match.

It made no difference, as UCLA demolished the Coyotes 15-0, 15-5, 15-4.

Amongst those receiving some playing time were setter Eric Vallely, outside hitters Matt Davis and Charlie Jackson, and middle blocker Seth Burnham.

After game one, the match was competitive for about 10 minutes. But then the second stringers found their rhythm and dominated the rest of the match.

One fan in the stands put it best when he commented, "they shouldn't play those matches. It makes no sense."

can only be drafted again after his junior year. Therefore Utley is not that worried about what scouts think of him right now.

"I just go out and play the best that I can," Utley said. "Scouts will see me in a couple of years, hopefully."

Utley can bet they'll be there with their radar guns, stop watches and notepads ready to go when it's his time to shine.

it the first time a UCLA women's basketball team has swept the Trojans since the 1989-90 season.

But the main story was the crowd. The Bruins had been averaging a dismal 1,308 per game. Many were shocked by the droves of people, mostly young children, that came out for the game.

"I didn't expect it to be this big," said Denise Curry, who played on the 1978 championship team and was one of the honorees on Saturday. "I was an assistant at Cal for six years, and up to a couple of years ago I came here every year to coach. The crowds were OK but nothing compared to this.

"This afternoon I showed up, and I had no idea there would be 6,000 to 7,000 people here. It's great. I'm pleased to see a lot of young players, a lot of young girls, and it's nice to see them come out and support UCLA basketball."

After the gold medal victory by the USA women's basketball team in the 1996 Atlantd games and the establishment of the Women's National Basketball Association (WNBA) last summer, the women's basketball fan base of recent years has reached heights the sport has never seen in its history.

"I think the big crowd today is great for women's basketball," head coach Kathy Olivier said. "Not only for UCLA but women's basketball in general. For us to get a crowd like this it is really saying something about L.A. and where women's basketball is going."

"The crowd was great," Bruin point guard Erica Gomez said. "I loved it. I wish we can play in front of crowds like that all the time. I think it only helps our team because we play so much better."

The crowd stayed loud the entire game. Even when USC jumped out to a 26-19 lead with 9:15 left in the first half, the crowd pushed the Bruins on a 17-6 run in the next five minutes.

"I noticed how loud it was when I was trying to call plays," said Gomez, who finished the game with 17 points and six assists. "People couldn't hear and I'm like, 'Dang, is it that loud in here?'"

The game would go back in forth until the Bruins captured a 46-40 lead at the break.

With centers Jane Hubbard and Carly Funicello getting four fouls early in the second half, other Bruin players had to step up. Sophomore Marie Philman was one of those clutch players as she sparked the Bruins to a 11-2 run to open the second half, scoring seven of her 15 points.

But it was a balanced attack that beat the Trojans. Nine of the 12 players on the team received 10 minutes or more. Showing great depth, the Bruin bench once again beat the opposition for its 19th game this season.

"(Our depth) is definitely one of our key points," Gomez said. "We have three and four and maybe sometimes five people coming off the bench. It helps us because the other team gets tired of our defensive pressure as we keep throwing bodies on them."

"When teams are getting tired, we are getting where its like 'C'mon I want some more minutes.'" Olivier said. "I went in there to prove I should be able to play more minutes."

The victory, which kept the Bruins two games behind of first-place Stanford in the Pac-10, impressed some of the Bruin honorees.

"I think it's a great team," Curry said, who is arguably the best women's basketball player in Bruin history, topping the list for most career points.

"Certainly the best is in front of them too. They are having a good year this year. They are capable of doing some good things when they get to the tournament. Certainly the next year and the following year they should be even tougher."

The sweep of the Trojans also says a lot about the future of this team. The Bruins, one has to remember, are still mainly a young team with eight sophomores on the roster, four of whom start.

"I think that this team has so much potential," Olivier said.

"And for us to accomplish something like this (sweeping the Trojans) I'm thinking, 'What's next? What can we do next?'"

Despite salary increases, arbitration average down

BASEBALL: Some find hefty hikes despite net decrease in the league

By Ronald Blum
The Associated Press

NEW YORK — While baseball owners prevented salary arbitration raises from topping last year's record, Milwaukee outfielder Jeromy Burnitz shattered the mark for the largest increase, getting a 1,511 percent hike.

Burnitz, who made $225,000 last season, got a 16-fold increase to an average of $3.62 million in his $14.5 million four-year contract. Burnitz, 28, hit .281 last season and led the Brewers with 27 homers and 85 RBIs.

Pedro Martinez had the previous record, a 12-fold hike from $315,000 in 1996 to $3.5 million in 1997. After the second year, Montreal traded him to Boston and he signed a record $75 million, six-year contract.

Overall, salaries increase 150 percent in arbitration, down from the record rise of 154 percent last year. The 81 players who filed in January saw their salaries rise from an average of $774,323 to an average of $1,936,400, according to a study by The Associated Press.

In the final case decided, Florida catcher Charles Johnson won late Saturday and was awarded an 11-fold raise from $290,000 to $3.3 million. The Marlins had offered $2.25 million.

BRIEFS

Women's tennis

The No.2-ranked UCLA women's tennis team did not fare well at the USTA/ITA Women's National Indoor Team Tennis Championships held at the University of Wisconsin. In the first round, UCLA lost to William & Mary (6-3). In the second round, the Bruins lost a tough match (5-4) against Mississippi after being down 3-0. The lone Bruin win came against South Alabama, as the Bruins destroyed them 8-1. Senior Kelly Rudolf, who played at the No.4 spot, won all of her singles matches. The Bruins' No. 1 player, sophomore Amanda Basica, did not play due to shoulder injury.

Men's tennis

The UCLA men's tennis team suffered a first-round loss to Illinois at the ITA Men's National Indoor Team Championships held at the Louisville Tennis Club. The Bruins lost a tough match by the score of 4-3, tying 3-3 in singles. The Bruins ultimately lost the match due to losing the doubles point. No. 1 player Noel-Grinda defeated Illinois' No. 1 player 7-5, 3-6, 6-1. Other winners were No. 2 Vince Allegre and No.4 Alex Decret, who had to go the distance before prevailing in a tough third set tie-breaker.

Men's soccer

The members of the UCLA men's soccer team, who won the national championship this past December, were honored this past Friday by Los Angeles City Councilmember Joel Wachs with their own day. Feb. 20 will forever be known as "UCLA Men's Soccer Day."

Bruins falter against tough competition

SOFTBALL: No. 17 UCLA troubled in late innings, finishes tournament 2-4

By Rocky Salmon
Daily Bruin Senior Staff

In San Diego last weekend, the UCLA softball team was ready to tell the world that the Bruins can't be taken lightly.

But as the rain moved in, it washed away their six-game unbeaten streak and brought in four tough losses to humble the team.

Thursday, the No. 17 Bruins battled Stanford with the game ending in extra innings. In the top of the first, Carissa Millsap lit up the Cardinal with a three-run double, breaking out of a mini-slump and Kim Wuest followed with a two-run shot to give the Bruins a 5-0 advantage.

However, the Bruins would need more runs to win this game, because freshman sensation Stephanie Swenson was hammered for eight runs in nine innings as the Cardinal brought across the go-ahead run in the bottom of the ninth, putting an end to Swenson's undefeated season.

Extremely exhausted from the nine-inning battle with the Cardinal, the Bruins would have to recuperate and battle No. 14 Long Beach State in game two that day.

This time Erin Weiler, a junior transfer, displayed her arm, beguiling the 49ers through five scoreless innings. But the UCLA offense was in a deep funk and could only muster a homer by Kim Wuest, giving her six on the season.

Once again, the Bruins would lose the game in the last inning, as Weiler could not hold back the pick-axes of the 49ers any longer. The 49ers pushed across three runs which would be the difference as UCLA's offense went to sleep.

In the second day of competition at the Campbell/Cartier Softball Classics, the Bruins faced their toughest competition against No. 4 Michigan.

The Bruins performed admirably against the Wolverines, but the lack of offense was once again fatal to the Bruin attack.

Swenson's only mistake would be to Cathy Davie who nailed a three-run homerun. With only two hits on the game, the Bruins fell to 0-3 in the tournament and had to wait for Saturday to win their first game in the tournament.

On Saturday, the Bruins lost their first game against Louisana State University, but bounced back against San Diego State University with a 8-0 clubbing. This seemed to rejuvenate the Bruins, as they won

CALIFORNIA SPORTS

Magic 96, Lakers 94

Nick Anderson didn't care to start another battle of words with Shaquille O'Neal.

Beating the Los Angeles Lakers center in his return to Orlando Arena was enough.

The most outspoken of Orlando's players in his criticism of O'Neal's decision to leave for Los Angeles in 1996, Anderson made a 3-pointer with 7.1 seconds remaining Sunday to cap a 30-point performance and give the Magic a 96-94 victory.

Anderson sparred verbally with O'Neal when the All-Star center fled Orlando a little more than a year after leading the Magic to the 1995 NBA Finals. But this time, he resisted the temptation to take a personal swipe at his ex-teammate, who once accused Anderson of being a divisive force in Orlando.

"I don't like getting into squabbles, saying things about Shaq," Anderson said. "Let him make his little comments about whatever. ... As a team, this was a good victory. I'm more happy for the fans than anything. They were waiting for this day to come."

The victory was the fourth straight for Orlando, which has won five of its last six to climb one game above .500 despite the absence of injured star Penny Hardaway, out with a strained left calf muscle.

The Lakers, starting a six-game East Coast road trip, have lost four of five.

Wolves 113, Kings 95

Anthony Peeler didn't waste any time making fans in Minnesota.

In his first game since being acquired by Vancouver for popular guard Doug West, Peeler scored 16 points Sunday to lead the Timberwolves to a 113-95 victory over the Sacramento Kings.

"The only thing bad was that I didn't know where to go when they called the plays," said Peeler, who hadn't played since Nov. 12, when a knee injury put him on the injured list.

Peeler missed his first two shots but made six of his last seven, including a pair of 3-pointers. Peeler, who had only played in eight games for the Grizzlies, played 22 minutes in his Wolves' debut.

"For a guy who hasn't played in (three) months, he did a great job for us coming off the bench and hitting open jumpers," said Minnesota coach Flip Saunders. "He fit in extremely well with only a day's practice."

Sam Mitchell scored 17 points for Minnesota, which had seven players in double figures.

Mitch Richmond had 32 points for the Kings, who lost for just the second time in six games.

Heat 90, Warriors 82

The Miami Heat got a rare road win when trailing after three quarters because P.J. Brown wouldn't let them lose.

Brown had 20 points and 14 rebounds as the Heat overcame a 16-point third-quarter deficit and beat the Golden State Warriors 90-82 Sunday night.

Miami got its seventh straight road victory and won for the first time in 11 road games when trailing after three quarters. Tim Hardaway had 24 points and 10 assists, while Brown had 16 points and nine rebounds in the second half.

"Keeping the lead down below 20 was the key to the game," said Brown, who scored 16 of his 20 points in the second half. "We hung in there. We just never wilted."

After strong start to '98 season, Bruins host annual tournament

GOLF: UCLA finished '97 well at NCAA Championships, hope to carry experience into Classic

By Ryota Kawai
Daily Bruin Contributor

The women's golf team heads out to Menifee Lakes Country Club in Temecula today to host their annual Pioneer/Bruin Classic Tournament.

Last year, the Bruins placed third at their own tournament, with Tulsa University winning with a total score of 934 strokes.

After having finished in fifth place last year at the NCAA Championships, the Bruins are off to a fast start for the 1997-98 season. The women's team finished 11th as a team at the season opening Rolex Fall Preview on Sept. 12-14.

> Coach Jackie Steinmann has a promising season to look forward to with the additions of freshmen Leilani Bagby, Julie Oh, Laura Moffat and Alicia Um.

Individually, senior Amandine Vincent placed a team-high 17th. The next tournament proved to be a breakthrough for Vincent, as she took top medalist honors for individuals, winning her first tournament in three years at the Dick McGuire Invitational on Sept. 25-27.

As a team, the Bruins had their best showing at the same tournament. The Bruins placed third out of a very competitive field

The Bruins have continued their impressive showings at the next three tournaments, placing eighth as a team at the Rolex Match Play Championships Nov. 1-3; sixth at the Golf World Invitational Nov. 14-16, with junior Sophie Sandolo placing 10th individually; and eighth at the Regional Challenge on Feb. 9-11, with Vincent placing a team-high 14th individually.

Coach Jackie Steinmann has a promising season to look forward to with the additions of freshmen Leilani Bagby, Julie Oh, Laura Moffat, and Alicia Um.

Bagby (Santa Monica High School), Oh (Torrance High School), and Um (Westlake High School) are all products from California. The fourth addition to the team, Moffat, hails from West Kilbride, Scotland, where she attended Glasgow Academy.

The team also boasts the services of sophomore Jill Axelrod, senior Betty Chen, sophomore Alexandra Gasser, junior Sophie Sandolo and senior Amandine Vincent. Vincent leads the team with the lowest stroke average at 74.4 strokes per round, with junior Sandolo trailing at 75.3.

Newcomers Bagby and Um have had impressive starts so far, averaging 77.6 and 77.5 strokes per round, respectively.

The Pioneer Electronics UCLA Golf Classic is a 54-hole stroke play event.

The field will feature three-time Pioneer Classic champion and fifth-ranked Tulsa, defending NCAA champion Arizona State University and Pac-10 opponents Oregon, Oregon State, USC and Stanford.

UCLA sweeps through competition

VOLLEYBALL: Squad has no trouble with Northridge, San Bernardino

By Grace Wen
Daily Bruin Staff

The domination continues.

The UCLA men's volleyball team picked up a couple of easy wins over the weekend.

On Saturday the Bruins defeated Cal State Northridge 15-6, 15-3, 15-3. The unbeaten Bruins made quick work of the Matadors, who were obviously out of their league.

"We just were very aware of where they were, particular (Chad) Strickland," UCLA head coach Al Scates said. "He's a very good player but he's not good enough to deal with our block on a consistent basis. He's got a heavy load on that club."

The Bruin block turned the lights out on Strickland as it held the Matador's leading hitter to just 11 kills and six errors in 26 attempts for a .192 clip. For the night UCLA (12-0, 8-0 MPSF) posted nine blocks and held Northridge to a .161 attack percentage while hitting a whopping .485.

Middle blocker Adam Naeve led the team with a match-high 19 kills and seven blocks while senior Ben Moselle spiked 13 kills and had three blocks including one solo stuff.

Despite holding a 2-4 lead in game one, the Matadors (3-7, 1-7) were unable to build up the lead as the Bruins' blocking took charge. A block by Moselle in a one-on-one situation started the run as UCLA tied the game and increased its lead to 8-4. The teams exchanged 16 sideouts before Naeve was blocked, bringing the score to 8-5.

Northridge would not get any closer throughout the night as an ace by setter Brandon Taliaferro ended the first game.

UCLA showed no mercy in game two by jumping out to an 11-2 lead. Like the previous victory, the fiery Taliaferro would have a hand in the final points of the game.

A roof and an ace by the sophomore setter would get UCLA to game point. His final blistering jump serve set up an overpass that sophomore Matt Davis would crush to end the game.

There was little doubt to the outcome of game three when UCLA took a commanding 11-3 lead. The Matadors' passing woes were especially obvious as three aces, two by Fred Robins and one from Moselle, along with a kill by Naeve, closed out the win.

"I thought UCLA played very well," CSUN head coach Jeff Campbell said. "They had a very good

SCOUTS: UCLA-Stanford game attracts some of baseball's upper echelon

By Vytas Mazeika
Daily Bruin Staff

Trivia Question:

What are radar guns, stop watches and notepads used for in a college baseball game?

Answer:

To scout the players.

There were major league talent scouts from the A's, Reds, Cardinals and Devil Rays there. There should have been some from the Angels, Dodgers, Giants and Padres. There could have been some scouts from other teams. The UCLA vs. Stanford game on Friday was that big – at least prospect-wise.

Top-ranked Stanford's junior pitching prospect Jeff Austin was throwing that night. For UCLA, outfield prospects Eric Valent (center field) and Eric Byrnes (right field) were hitting. Whenever talented players match-up against top-notch competition you can see a scout salivating.

Do the players notice? Well, kind of.

"Maybe somewhere way, way in the back of my mind," Austin, who lowered his ERA from 2.00 to 1.80 with an eight inning and 142 pitch performance, said. "Maybe way, way in the back, but I really didn't notice a single scout here tonight. If they were here, that's good. But if not, we still put up 18 runs and won the game."

Byrnes, who Saturday stole second and third during one at-bat for his 26th steal in a row without being caught, tends to agree with Austin.

"I just go out there and I'm play a certain way, whether there are 100 scouts in the stands or there are nobody in the stands," Byrnes said. "I think I've played in front of the scouts ever since I was a junior in high school, so it doesn't really matter. I think a lot of them know what I can do. I've been here for four years and they've seen me play. They've seen me at my best and I think they've seen me at my worst."

One scout attending the game alertly pointed his radar gun at Austin and clocked Byrnes' speed. When asked if he had any comments about the performance of the players, the scout mentioned that although UCLA was part of the region he must scout, it's still too early in the season to make a judgment. Instead, he chose to remain diplomatic.

"Each time (you watch the players) you kind of fine tune your evaluation," the scout explained. "The first time I see them I don't know if they have a temperature, or a nagging injury or if they're having a bad day. I don't get an honest look at them."

Then there is the freshman perspective. UCLA shortstop Chase Utley was already drafted out of high school by the Dodgers in the second round.

But when Utley chose to come to UCLA the Dodgers lost rights to sign him to a contract and a college player

W. BASKETBALL: Trojans take early lead but fans push UCLA to 87-73 win

By Chris Umpierre
Daily Bruin Contributor

In a game in which the UCLA women's basketball program celebrated its stellar history, the Bruins made some history of their own.

In Saturday afternoon's game against USC, the Bruins honored the 1977-1978 UCLA women's national championship team – the only one in school history – and the program's top 15 players.

In front of the Bruin greats, UCLA (16-7, 11-3) pulled away from USC (10-13, 5-9) in the second half to notch a 87-73 victory before a raucous 7,258 fans.

The crowd was the largest ever to watch a UCLA women's basketball regular season game and the third largest to ever watch a women's basketball game in Pauley Pavilion history. Only two playoff games, during the 1977-1978 championship run, had bigger crowds than Saturday's game.

The victory also put the Bruins in the school record books by sweeping the Trojans in the regular season. UCLA had beaten the Women of Troy 68-64 on Jan. 23 at USC's Lyon Center. This year's season sweep made

M. BASKETBALL: With Henderson in foul trouble, team can't stop Duke

DURHAM, N.C. – Well at least it wasn't the worst loss this season, but it was close.

The No. 12 UCLA men's basketball team was routed on Sunday afternoon at Cameron Indoor Stadium by No. 2 Duke, 120-84.

The Bruins (20-6) came out with intensity for the tough non-conference matchup. Toby Bailey opened up the game blocking Blue Devil Chris Carrawell's shot. And J.R. Henderson slammed home a pass from Baron Davis that seemed to state that, despite the loss of center Jelani McCoy, the undermanned Bruins were not going to be pushovers.

Bailey would hit a three-pointer on the ensuing possession and UCLA would have the lead for the only time in the game after a minute and a half of play. And then the Devils (25-2) showed why they were No. 2 in the nation.

The next six minutes perhaps set the tone for the rest of the game. Duke went on a 19-3 run and extended its lead to 13, a lead that the Bruins would never overcome and that the Blue Devils would only build on.

And Henderson, a pivotal piece to the UCLA squad as well as the tallest player for the Bruins, would pick up three fouls. UCLA head coach Steve Lavin was forced to sit the 6-foot-8 1/2-inch senior for the remaining 13:23 of the first half and insert 6-foot-3-inch freshman Rico Hines.

"J.R. Henderson is a central figure to our success," Lavin said. "And when Henderson isn't on the floor it puts a tremendous amount of pressure on us because now Hines and Travis Reed are our next biggest players.

"They're freshman and they're getting better, but that's a lot of pressure on the road," he said

Henderson's absence hurt UCLA's offense more than it hurt the Bruin defense, though. Without Henderson's size under the basket, UCLA struggled to

W. GYM: Score lowest of recent tournaments, but is enough to scrape out victory over tough competitors

By Christie DeBeau
Daily Bruin Contributor

While the scores were down for the UCLA women's gymnastics team at the Bruin Classic on Sunday, the team's performanc was still strong enough to beat the tough competition from Pennsylvania State, California State University, Fullerton and Oregon State.

Fifth-ranked UCLA (11-1) placed first in the meet with a team score of 194.550, which was high enough to beat 11th-ranked Oregon State (192.550), seventh-ranked Penn State (190.800) and Fullerton (189.275).. The Bruins' score at the Classic is not their lowest of the season, but is a step down from their last two meets where they scored above a 195.

The team started off strong with their first event, vault, but were unable to perform at the same high level throughout every rotation. On vault, UCLA placed first and received a score that will improve their ranking.

"I feel the meet was a strong one because they worked through it," UCLA head coach Valorie Kondos said. "They were flat tonight, and the energy was not there to carry them through the next event. You could tell that they were exhausted because they started off so strong on vault. Usually if you start off good on an event the momentum builds, but the fact that the momentum started dying shows they were tired.

"However this is what is supposed to happen. With the science of deterioration you are supposed to have highs and lows. We have had two very good meets, the last two ones, and so I was anticipating a down. As long as they were able to work through it and come out as healthy as they came in, that is my main priority," said Kondos.

In all-around competition the Bruins took the top three places with Lena Degteva in first, followed by Heidi Moneymaker and Stella Umeh.

Sunday's meet was the first time that sophomore Degteva had placed first in all-around competition since January of her freshman year.

"Lena did a great job," Kondos said. "Before she went up on every event, one of her teammates had a mishap of some sort and I would go up to her and say 'come on Lena, you have got to bring the team together and it is up to you to get this team on fire now.' I think that she felt the responsibility of that and really rose to the occasion."

The meet was also important for junior Lisa Hiley, who placed second in the meet. This is Hiley's best placement in her career on any event.

"I am happy about my performance," Hiley said. "I like the vault. I am doing right now a lot better. I can be more aggressive on it."

"The fact that Lisa was able to compete her vault as well as she did was amazing," Kondos said. "That is a very difficult vault and it was more difficult than anyone's on the team or anyone's in here tonight and she does it phenomenally. This is from a walk-on athlete that just started learning it about two months ago, so today was a huge success."

UNIVERSITY: Espinoza has many experiences to bring to new position

By Dennis Lim
Daily Bruin Contributor

Max Espinoza, USAC Academic Affairs Commissioner, has been nominated to be the next UC student regent.

"I'm extremely honored to receive this nomination," Espinoza said.

"I look forward to bringing my experience in representing student concerns and perspectives to the UC Board of Regents as it deliberates on the many important issues facing the University of California," he added.

Espinoza, the student regent-designate, was chosen from a field of 56 applicants from all nine UC campuses. His nomination will be considered by the full board at its meeting March 19-20.

Espinoza has served as the Academic Affairs Commissioner for the last two years, and was the chairperson of MEChA the year before that. He has been a leading campus activist, working extensively on numerous campus issues.

"I am interested in working with the other regents on issues related to access, affordability, outreach, retention, diversity and equal opportunity," Espinoza said.

If appointed, Espinoza will have the same duties as any regent on the board, which will include voting on all issues affecting the nine UC campuses.

"According to the constitution (of California), the student regent is a regent like any other," said Kathryn McClymond, the current student regent.

Representatives from USAC expressed elation at Espinoza's success.

Abi Karlin-Resnick, USAC Community Service Commissioner, stressed Espinoza's ability as a student leader.

"He is really strong about giving students a voice, whether it be through student programs or student rights," Karlin-Resnick said.

Espinoza's new position on the board of regents would help make "many issues at UCLA more noticeable," according to Karlin-Resnick.

"UCLA has been at the forefront of many issues concerning education and (Espinoza) has been critical to many of those issues. I have no reason to believe that he won't continue to do so as the new student regent," Karlin-Resnick continued.

Representatives from the University of California Student Association (UCSA) agreed with Karlin-Resnick.

"We are confident in his ability and

DIVERSITY: Plan would qualify top 4 percent of California high schoolers

By Marisa Wong
Daily Bruin Contributor

In an attempt to increase the pool of UC applicants, the UC Board of Regents discussed qualifying the top 4 percent of students from every California high school for admission to the UC system.

An estimated 3,500 additional students would be added to the applicant pool, while the amount of students admitted would not increase, said Terry Lightfoot, spokesperson for the UC Office of the President.

Because of this, Lightfoot estimates that 10 to 15 percent of all applicants could be affected by this plan.

UC Regents speculate that admitting the top 4 percent of each high school's students would help increase the diversity of UC applicants, and give schools an incentive to offer more college preparatory classes to make more students eligible for admission.

"One would hope it would broaden the number of schools from which we are drawing and add a more diverse element to the student body," said Regent Judith Levin. "It also might encourage schools to make more students eligible if this guarantee were in place."

"We are realizing that there are some hard working, motivated students who find themselves at a disadvantage when competing for admission to the university," Lightfoot said.

UC Director of Admissions Carla Ferri said the plan will not make currently eligible students ineligible – it would just increase the number of students in the eligibility pool.

"The eligibility rate for UC admis-

HEALTH: New technique pioneered at UCLA may prevent hip replacement

By Kathryn Combs
Daily Bruin Staff

She hikes, she walks and she sits, all without pain. A miracle?

Though most take these activities for granted, Anne Donnelly doesn't. Three years ago she could not do these things without severe pain in her hips and knees, due to a condition called avascular osteonecrosis – or bone death.

However, thanks to a new technique pioneered by UCLA researcher Dr. Jay Lieberman, patients like Donnelly can walk a little easier.

"I don't even think of the pain anymore," Donnelly said.

Osteoregeneration is a technique that may prevent the need for total hip replacement.

Donnelly, now 38, has been taking prednisone, a steriod, which led to the deterioration of her bones.

"I was getting pain especially in my left hip and it was also affecting my knee," Donnelly recounted.

"I would always push myself through the pain," she said.

While the cause is largely unknown, steroids such as prednisone can lead to bone death. Other factors include trauma to the hip joint causing dislocation, and chronic alcohol use.

In the new technique, termed osteoregeneration, Lieberman modified an already existing technique called core decompression.

"We drill a hole to get out as much of the dead bone as we can," Lieberman said.

However, according to Lieberman, this technique is controversial within the medical community because this method can further weaken the hip joint.

In core decompression, doctors drill a hole through the head of the femur, the knobby end of the thigh bone. Doctors then remove all the dead bone in the hope that new bone will develop.

PRIZES: Avid collectors funded competition to encourage students to pursue literary knowledge

By Teresa Jun
Daily Bruin Contributor

It's time to dust off those shelves of books sitting at home, because you may have a chance to win hundreds of dollars for them.

By entering your prized collection of Richard Nixon biographies or your favorite collection of hardback Sherlock Holmes mysteries, you could win anywhere from $200 to $600 in this year's Campbell Student Book Collection Competition.

For those who are wondering what a book collection exactly consists of, a book collection is more than just a set of random books you happen to have at home.

"A collection has a theme, a focused idea," explained Silvia Mariscal, member of the Campbell Competition committee.

Past collections have focused on such various topics as vampires, Pilipina writers, photography, Kosher cooking, the culture of wine and the women of Camelot.

"There are always different varying topics," said Octavio Olvera, another member of the Campbell Competition committee. "It really depends on what interests people."

Competition committee members agree that although it takes a long time to create and refine a book collection, it is not hard to start one.

"Most people, when they buy books on a topic that interests them, they don't realize they're starting a collection," Mariscal said. "They buy one, and then they buy another one because they like the topic. One thing just leads to another, and it can also get very expensive."

Winning collections will be judged

Diversity awards come to UC San Francisco

Four people at UC San Francisco recently were awarded the Martin Luther King, Jr. Award for promoting diversity and ideals inspired by the civil rights leader.

Dr. Daniel Lowenstein, one of the recipients, served as co-chair of the Chancellor's Steering Committee on Diversity 1995-1997.

In that position, Lowenstein helped develop programs addressing campus diversity and affirmative action. He also obtained funding for committee activities.

Stella Hsu, who served with Lowenstein on the steering committee, played a role in establishing programs that promote mutual respect, understanding and appreciation for cultural diversity at the campus.

Kyra Bobinet and Jennifer Danek, fourth-year medical students, received the award for the program they devised to help at-risk youth at a San Francisco youth guidance center.

UCLA researchers win grant money

UCLA researchers will test a dormant part of the human body to see if they can regenerate an immune system in patients with AIDS.

Jerome Zack, associate director of the UCLA AIDS Institute, and Beth Jamieson will work with a $75,000 grant which Zack won from the American Foundation for AIDS Research. They will investigate if the thymus, which grows dormant after the age of 18, can reproduce T-lymphocyte cells, immune cells that combat viruses.

The researchers will transplant adult human thymus tissue into mice without immune systems and test whether the thymus becomes active again, producing T-lymphocyte cells. If this stage is successful, Zack and Jamieson will investigate whether the thymus can continue to function in the presence of HIV.

Last fall, these researchers made a similar discovery using fetal immune stem cells in animals to find that an HIV-infected immune system can regenerate itself with antiviral drug therapy.

"Our early research gave us hope that HIV directly affects the T-cells themselves, not the fetal thymus or the rest of the immune environment. Now we must determine if the adult thymus has similar potential to regenerate a new immune system," Zack said.

Four researchers at UCLA's Jonsson Cancer Center won $350,000 awards to further their research of treatments of prostate cancer.

The Association for the Cure of Cancer of the Prostate (CaP CURE) chose Charles Sawyers, Rob Reiter, Sam Gambhir and Ayyappan Rajasekaran among the 85 winners from a field of 571 prostate cancer experts.

Sawyers, Reiter and Rajasekaran will work on treatment plans for those with cancer, while Gambhir will work on a decision-support system to help patients weigh their options when deciding on treatment.

Hollywood mogul donates $10 million

Universal Studios Chairman Emeritus Lew Wasserman and his wife, Edie, have donated $10 million to Campaign UCLA, the campuswide fund-raising effort established in May 1997.

The announcement was made Monday evening at UCLA's annual College of Letters and Science Awards dinner. Nearly 400 people attended the black-tie gala at The Regent Beverly Wilshire Hotel.

Most of the gift, $8.75 million, will go to the Edith and Lew Wasserman Fund for Undergraduate Support at UCLA, to provide scholarships for promising undergraduate education, according to UCLA Chancellor Albert Carnesale.

An endowment of $250,000 will be used as a maintenance fund for the new UCLA Palm Springs Center.

STATE OF OUR UNION

Ackerman has seen its share of changes in 37 years, but it still remains a center of campus life

By Rachel Muñoz
Daily Bruin Staff

Can you imagine a UCLA without an Ackerman Student Union? Where would students dine on Panda Express and shop for the latest UCLA sweatshirt? What would the campus do without the Grand Ballroom that houses so many job fairs and $2 movies?

Imagine an empty space the size of Ackerman. If one looks 37 years back into UCLA history, one will find it.

UCLA has witnessed 79 years of classes, students, professors, research and memories. This series presents some chapters of our history.

Originally, Kerckhoff Hall was used for the student union, but as soon as the building was put into use, it was clear that the facilities were inadequate. At the time that Kerckhoff was constructed in 1931, UCLA's student body consisted of 6,500 students, almost one-sixth of today's 35, 558 students.

In 1956, when five years later the enrollment would triple, a College Union Committee was appointed to investigate the possibilities of an addition to Kerckhoff.

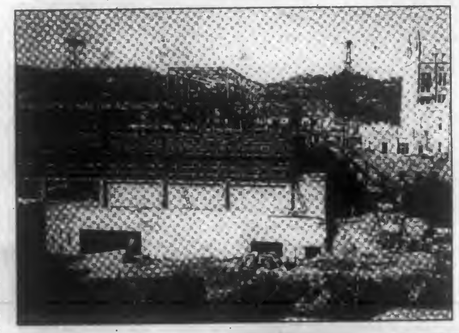
What the committee proposed seemed more like a small community than just an addition. The new seven-level structure would lodge bowling, billiards, table tennis, food services, a post office, hotel rooms and two small dormitories for visiting guests and teams.

But the committee's big ideas didn't lose sight of the students and their needs. The committee ran an ad in the Daily Bruin for a contest to submit suggestions for the building.

Fifty dollars would be rewarded for the best idea, while $25 would be awarded to the person who thought up the best name for the building.

With a minimum of 200 entries needed to support the contest, the 32 entries later determined the contest invalid.

However, those 32 participants entertained ideas of informal dance and jukebox areas as well as a television lounge.



On Oct. 16 and 17, 1957, a special student referendum was held to address the issue of a new student union building that would be partially financed through student fees.

A landslide vote of 2,412 to 354 students was in favor of such a building. Beginning in 1960, students paid $12 per year to repay two of the loans needed to build Ackerman.

Half the funds for the building were provided by government loans and the other $2.75 million was acquired in revenue bonds that were sold through the UC Regents.

Marchers trumpeting civil rights voice opposition to Prop. 226

PROTEST: Labor groups, community join forces to support King's goals

By Ann Hawkey
Daily Bruin Contributor

Thousands gathered Monday in downtown Los Angeles to show their remembrance and support for Martin Luther King Jr.'s goals.

The march was largely a forum for opponents of Proposition 226 to voice concerns about the initiative, which will be on the June ballot and could take political power away from unions. Labor groups joined forces with the community to protest Proposition 226, as well as other related issues such as affirmative action.

Even the rain could not dampen the spirit of the rally as the Compton High School Band helped keep the atmosphere upbeat. Some marchers energetically sang songs reminiscent of the Civil Rights Movement, while others chanted in Spanish, "What do we want? Justice! When do we want it? Now!"

Civic leaders such as the Rev. Jesse L. Jackson, California state chair Danny J. Bakewell Sr. and many others attended the march, which was sponsored in part by the Rainbow Coalition and the Brotherhood Crusade.

The march began at the Los Angeles Memorial Coliseum and ended at the Ronald Reagan State Building.

Many groups came to the march to protest Proposition 226, which opponents have labeled the "Anti-Labor Initiative."

"This partially deceptive proposition is aimed at the heart of the democratic process," said Rick Chertoff, executive director of the western region of the Jewish Labor Committee.

Local union 660, representing Los Angeles County workers, opposes Proposition 226 because it will "put unions in an uncomfortable position because of new yearly fees," said Tommie Shaw, member of the Local 660 executive board.

Proposition 226 would require unions to gain employee authorization for payroll deductions that would be donated toward union political issues.

Another political issue that concerned unions attending the march Monday was Proposition 209.

Several organizations Monday showed their opposition to Proposition 209, which eliminated affirmative action in public entities.

"We are standing up for affirmative action," said Jim Hard of the California State Employee Association.

"Anybody that thinks 400 years of racism can be overcome by 20 to 30 years of affirmative action doesn't know or doesn't care," he said.

"How jobs and admission to schools are given is not equal," said Elenore A. Williams. "Minorities need a level playing field."

Supporters of Proposition 209 claim the law helps eliminate unfair hiring practices and college admissions based on race rather than merit.

Affirmative action was one way in which the "Save the Dream" march united labor and the community.

"This is a good way to express that the community and labor are on the same level," said Fred Pascual of Local 11, a union of hotel and restaurant workers.

"This sends a clear message that when we get organized we can get things moving."

Strong opinions and a desire for change were not the only reasons for the large turnout. Many came to express their hopes for a better future for their children.

"We want our children to have the same opportunity as everyone else," said Cecilia Ruiz of United Farm Workers.

"What gave me the motivation to march here is for my grandchildren to have a better future than myself," said Marie White.

The day's common theme was King's dream.

"It's all about keeping Martin Luther King's dream alive," said Ruiz. "It was 30 years ago he died and here we are fighting for the same things."

"I treasure the man who had high values and was willing to stand up for those values, not only for himself, but for his family and mankind," said Ralph L. Franklin vice president of United Food and Commercial Workers International.

"We want then to keep hope alive that there is justice in America and we have to work together to prevail," he said.

Clinton waits for details about U.N. agreement

IRAQ: Last-minute pact may end looming threat of British, U.S. air strikes

By Barry Schweid
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON – President Clinton consulted with world leaders Monday about a tentative U.N. agreement with Saddam Hussein that might avert military strikes against Iraq. The administration withheld judgment and kept American forces in the Persian Gulf ready for action.

Clinton and Vice President Al Gore were briefed by National Security Adviser Sandy Berger on what the administration knows about the tentative accord. Clinton was a half hour late to a White House meeting with the nation's governors, explaining, "I've been working on the situation in Iraq."

The president said he had a lengthy discussion by phone with British Prime Minister Tony Blair, his most steadfast ally in threatening military strikes against Iraq, and planned to call Russian President Boris Yeltsin and French President Jacques Chirac. Clinton also spoke with U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan Sunday night after Annan struck the agreement with Saddam Hussein.

Officials said the United States was awaiting full details of the agreement before passing judgment.

House Speaker Newt Gingrich, speaking to business leaders in Smyrna, Ga., said, "I hope that (Annan) has gotten a good agreement and I hope it is one that guarantees a chemical and biological weapon-free Iraq." He urged the administration to be ready for immediate action if Saddam fails to live up the agreed terms.

Administration officials were intrigued but not convinced that Saddam had met all conditions for unlimited U.N. access to weapons sites in the agreement.

It may take a couple of days before Clinton and his advisers have all the facts they want to decide whether the crisis with Iraq is over. Annan was flying to France today and then on to New York to report to the U.N. Security Council, probably Today.

Even if the report turned out to be completely positive, administration officials and others stressed the litmus test would be whether Iraq followed through and opened its arms stores to U.N. inspectors at times and places of the inspection team's choosing.

Peace talks interrupted by car bomb

IRELAND: Sinn Fein demands to speak with British Prime Minister

By Shawn Pogatch
The Associated Press

BELFAST, Northern Ireland – A car bomb exploded in a staunchly pro-British Protestant town Monday, a few hours after peace talks on Northern Ireland's future resumed.

Police said no injuries were reported from the blast in Portadown, 30 miles southwest of Belfast, but one building was badly damaged by fire.

"Flames are shooting into the sky. I have seen people in tears, people are shocked and stunned," said Portadown Mayor Kenneth Twydle.

Several telephoned warnings to Belfast media allowed police to evacuate nearby streets before the explosion.

In Belfast, peace negotiations resumed today with the IRA – the allied Sinn Fein party was excluded because of two killings this month blamed on the Irish Republican Army.

David Trimble, leader of the largest Protestant party, the Ulster Unionists, said the bombing "underscored the silliness" of plans to let Sinn Fein return to the talks within two weeks.

Trimble, who represents Portadown in the British Parliament, said an unclaimed car-bomb attack on one Protestant town Friday and the bombing today are "the IRA's response to the conduct of the talks."

Brid Rodgers, a Roman Catholic and local official in the Portadown area, said attacking Portadown "appears to have been designed to cause maximum provocation and to draw other extremists into a response against the north's innocent Catholic population."

Sinn Fein is demanding to meet with British Prime Minister Tony Blair, and says that otherwise it might not return to the talks March 9, the date specified by the governments. Blair's Downing Street office said he was considering their

Tobacco industry fights for its First Amendment rights

CONGRESS: Public health experts want to eliminate ads that target children

By David E. Rosenbaum
The New York Times

WASHINGTON – It would be "absolutely impermissible" for the government to block lawsuits against the tobacco companies, former Food and Drugs Commissioner David Kessler said last week. "There should be no concessions to this industry."

In Congress, where the companies have about as much political support as an international drug cartel, Kessler's stance is clearly the prevailing one. "Their effort to target 14-year-olds is frankly reprehensible," said House Speaker Newt Gingrich. "They are weaker than they have ever been in this city, and I think that there is virtually no sentiment for in any way listening favorably to the tobacco companies."

But the tobacco industry has a lever that could force anti-smoking crusaders and Congress to relent: the U.S. Constitution.

J. Skelly Wright, a federal judge and a renowned civil libertarian, stated the case in 1971 in a way that still resounds. He did not doubt that the sexy girl in the Salem advertisements was "in fact a seductive merchant of death and that the real Marlboro Country is the graveyard," Wright wrote. "But the First Amendment does not protect only speech that is healthy or harmless."

Meyer Koplow, a lawyer for the tobacco industry, insisted last week that unless Congress enacted a law that gave tobacco companies considerable protection from damage suits, the cigarette companies would not agree to modify their relentless ad campaigns. Congress cannot stop the ads, Koplow asserted, because to do so would violate the companies' right to free speech.

This is important because the primary goal of public health advocates like Kessler is to prevent teen-agers from starting to smoke, and ubiquitous cigarette advertising seems to be a significant factor in whether they start.

A study published last week in the Journal of the American Medical Association concluded that advertising was even more crucial than peer pressure. The study, conducted by researchers at the University of California, San Diego, found that the tobacco companies' advertisements and promotions were the underlying reason that at least one-third of 12- to 17-year-olds who experimented with cigarettes did so.

So the situation, in Koplow's view, is that either the government will approve a deal with the tobacco industry similar to the one the industry and about 40 state attorneys general reached last summer, or cigarette advertising will continue unabated, the industry will challenge in court any legislative attempt to stop it and millions more young people will get hooked on smoking.

Under last summer's settlement, which can take effect only to the extent Congress approves it, the companies would waive their First

Bird flu antibodies discovered in humans

HONG KONG – Doctors have found antibodies to the bird flu virus in health workers, officials said Monday, renewing fears that the virus that killed six people in Hong Kong could be spread by human contact.

The virus was first detected in humans last year, and doctors have been trying since then to determine how it is transmitted – particularly, if it could be spread by contact with infected people as well as infected poultry.

Preliminary findings of blood tests show fewer than 10 health workers have developed antibodies to the virus, government spokeswoman Pauline Ling said.

Some of them "may have been in contact with bird flu patients," she said.

The presence of antibodies means a person was exposed to the virus and developed resistance, with or without developing symptoms.

The virus killed six people and infected 12 others. No new cases have been found since the government banned live chicken imports and killed all of Hong Kong's 1.4 million chickens in December.

Prosecutors seek life sentence for Nichols

DENVER – Federal prosecutors urged a judge Monday to sentence Terry Nichols to life behind bars for his role in the Oklahoma City bombing, calling a defense motion seeking a four-year prison sentence "absurd."

Prosecutor Sean Connelly petitioned U.S. District Judge Richard Matsch to hand Nichols the harshest possible penalty, not a sentence that would be more appropriate in a minor drug crime.

Connelly's brief came in response to a motion by Nichols' attorneys that he should serve four to six years in prison for the April 19, 1995, bombing that killed 168 people and injured hundreds more.

In a separate trial, Timothy McVeigh was sentenced to death after he was convicted on murder, conspiracy and weapons charges in the blast.

Nichols, 42, was convicted last month of conspiracy and manslaughter, but acquitted of murder and weapons charges. The jury was unable to agree on a sentence, sparing him the death penalty.

Matsch has set a March 25 hearing to decide what guidelines to follow in sentencing Nichols but no sentencing date has been set.

Couple believed dead in small plane crash

SUTTER, Calif. – A cattle rancher and his sons discovered the wreckage of a small airplane that crashed in the Sutter Buttes, apparently killing both people aboard.

The unidentified remains of one person were found. The victims were believed to be a husband and wife from Kern County who were returning to Bakersfield after visiting relatives in Chico.

Initial investigations indicate the plane may have collided with the summit of Eagle Peak, spreading debris on both sides of the peak. Weather conditions at the time were said to be poor.

The twin-engine Beechcraft had left Chico at 4 p.m. and crashed sometime Saturday night about three miles north of the town of Sutter, authorities said. The aircraft was registered to Steven Thomas of Maricopa,

Austin Lemenager, the owner of the land that the crash was discovered on, said he was herding cattle with two of his sons on Sunday when they saw the wreck.

"When we first saw it we thought it could've been a big rock loosened by the rain. It wasn't too long until we knew it was a plane wreck," Lemenager said. "There was just nothing left."

Asked whether he believed the agreement was likely to satisfy U.S. demands, Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., said on NBC's "Today" show, "I would suspect that it probably is." He added that given Saddam's past record on dealing with weapons inspectors, "We may most likely be revisiting this problem in a month or two."

Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., said Monday that even if the deal is solid, the U.S. government should step up efforts to oust Saddam. He said he planned to propose that Saddam be brought before an international war crimes tribunal.

"One way or another we're going to have to topple Saddam Hussein" to ensure that he does not build weapons of mass destruction, Specter told CNN.

A previous impasse on weapon inspections was resolved in November only to have Iraq shift strategies and restrict inspections in January. The current crisis was spurred by Iraq's refusal to accept American inspectors, accusing them of espionage.

Early today in Baghdad, Annan signed what he called a "serious, credible agreement" with Iraqi Deputy Prime Minister Tariq Aziz.

At the same time, the Pentagon began steps to call up some 500 military reservists for possible assistance in case of an attack on Iraq.

Aziz credited Annan's diplomacy for clinching the deal. The agreement came from "the goodwill he brought with him – not the American or the British buildup in the Gulf, and not the policy of saber-rattling," Aziz said.

Even before the official signing, the U.S. caution contrasted with the near-jubilation within the Annan entourage. Annan's spokesman, Fred Eckhard, said the agreement assured the rights of U.N. inspectors and did not include a time limit on searches for biological and chemical weapons ingredients.

"We obviously have serious questions," State Department spokesman James P. Rubin said Sunday after Secretary of State Madeleine Albright called Annan and received "a short phone briefing."

She "did not receive a comprehensive assessment" from Annan, Rubin said. "And therefore we are not in a position to make a judgment whether the principles for a peaceful solution have been achieved."

"Whatever happens, we will be looking for action, not words," on whether Iraq meets the terms set down by the United States, Rubin said.

One of the conditions for a settlement, he said, was unlimited access for the U.N. monitoring commission. Another was maintaining the authority of the commission to make inspection decisions and to choose the composition of each team based on expertise, not nationality.

Annan spoke by telephone to Blair. Britain joined the United States in deferring a judgment pending Annan's briefing on the details.

Albright, meanwhile, conferred by telephone with British Foreign Secretary Robin Cook and French Foreign Minister Hubert Vedrine after talking to Annan. Cook, speaking today in Brussels, said: "Saddam is a man who only makes an agreement under pressure."

News of the agreement came after Albright said the United States would act alone against Iraq if any agreement Annan brought from Baghdad jeopardized U.S. interests.

request.

Ulster Unionist negotiator Ken Maginnis said a Blair-Sinn Fein meeting now during the "quarantine period" would "fatally undermine" the negotiating effort.

"If the prime minister leads a gutless government then of course he may well bow to the diktats of Sinn Fein-IRA," Maginnis said.

A Protestant party today was readmitted to the negotiations at Stormont, the center of British administration for Northern Ireland where the talks began in June 1996.

The Ulster Democratic Party was barred four weeks ago after the pro-British paramilitary group it represents, the Ulster Defense Association, admitted killing Catholics in violation of its own October 1994 truce.

Former U.S. Sen. George Mitchell, chairman of the talks, requires all participants to adhere to a code of nonviolence or risk indefinite exclusion.

Ulster Democrats leader Gary McMichael said the governments were "running scared" of the possibility that the IRA might resume full-scale bloodshed in Northern Ireland and Britain. He said Sinn Fein should have been excluded for at least as long as his own party.

sion is now 11.1 percent of all high school students," Ferri said. "We should be at 12.5 percent and this plan brings us up to the level we ought to be."

UC officials also speculate that many of the students who already are automatically admitted to the UCs would still be in the top 4 percent category.

Criteria for what constitutes the top 4 percent of high school students has yet to be determined, but Ferri said students will still have to meet the minimum admission requirements of at least a 3.3 GPA, 15 units of college preparatory courses, and SAT I and II examination results.

Students who do not automatically qualify for admission with the 4 percent plan would be admitted using the current admission standards.

Some university officials have concerns with the considered 4 percent plan and fear that this could discourage other eligible students from applying to the UC system.

"It may begin to act to discourage some students," Levin said. "Some may think, 'Why should I try when I'm going to lose my space to someone at another school?'"

Levin also said she was concerned about the possibility of the criteria not evaluating students on individual merit or specific academic accomplishment, but rather on GPA.

UCLA Assistant Vice Chancellor Tom Lifka said he questions what the criteria for the top 4 percent will be and also questions whether high schools will want to be put in the position to determine their top students.

He also stated that he does not think this process should be used as a way to create a more diverse applicant pool.

"Eligibility is ultimately a question of whether students are well prepared academically and have achieved a level of competency," Lifka said. "It shouldn't be used as a vehicle for achieving various forms of diversity."

Currently 50 California high schools do not send any students to UC schools. The four percent plan will be discussed again at the end of the school year, and if implemented, will probably take affect for the class of 2000.

Amendment right and voluntarily take steps like discontinuing advertisements featuring cartoon characters and celebrities, ending outdoor advertising and restricting print advertisements to publications read primarily by adults.

In return, the agreement would prohibit class-action lawsuits, limit claims for punitive damages based on past industry conduct and place a ceiling on how much the companies would have to pay each year in compensatory damages.

Koplow's view of the cigarette companies' First Amendment rights is not universally accepted. Indeed, the question of commercial free speech is an unsettled area of constitutional law that has taken several twists and turns in recent years.

Just last spring, for instance, the Supreme Court refused to consider a challenge to a Court of Appeals decision that upheld the constitutionality of Baltimore ordinances prohibiting cigarette and liquor advertising on billboards in residential neighborhoods.

In Senate testimony this month, Professor Richard A. Daynard of the Northeastern University School of Law observed that, since the 1930s, federal law has regulated the advertising of stocks and bonds. "If Congress can limit securities offerers to tombstone advertising to protect people's pocketbooks," Daynard asserted, "then surely it can similarly limit tobacco company advertising to protect people's lives and health."

But the dominant view of practicing lawyers and academics who specialize in First Amendment law is that broad restraints on advertising are unconstitutional and that the Supreme Court is likely to become increasingly protective of commercial speech.

At the same tobacco hearing where Daynard testified, Floyd Abrams, a prominent First Amendment lawyer from New York, declared, "If the proposed settlement were enacted into law, I believe it would be held to violate the First Amendment."

BONE

But this technique is only effective in cases detected early, according to Lieberman.

The new technique employs core decompression and combines it with Bone Morphogenetic Protein (BMP), a bone-forming protein.

"What's happening is that BMP will help stimulate these cells to make bone," Lieberman said.

BMP was discovered by Dr. Marshall Urist in 1965 at UCLA.

"The mode of action is like a railroad switch, from fibrous tissue to bone and bone marrow. It regulates the development of bone," Urist added.

Doctors also use a bone graft to complete the procedure and the results have ranged from good to excellent.

"This technique has helped me immensely," Donnelly said.

"(Lieberman) thinks it is just a matter of time until I have to have a hip replacement, but I do everything," Donnelly said.

Donnelly performs tasks from mowing the lawn, to weeding, to taking mile-long hikes with her three kids.

"Sometimes it is difficult to make treatment decisions and there are a number of different treatments," Lieberman said.

"We are offering this because we think it is a biological solution to the problem," he added.

Thus far, the procedure has been performed on 10 patients, ranging from ages 29 to 57.

"We don't have enough data at this time to say that it is better, but a lot of the other techniques have not been shown to work," Lieberman said. "(However), it is a definite step in the right direction."

As a result of this procedure Donnelly is now able to perform a number of activities without pain.

"Now I am pain-free active," she said.

on the focus, content and quality of the collections.

That's why people like Mariscal are always impressed with the book collections that students turn in every year.

Last year's first place winner among the undergraduate entries admits to working on his collection for about seven years before entering the competition.

Initially turned on to Japanese film years ago through a class he took and also through several visits to the Pacific Film Archive in Berkeley, Hiram Piskatel, a fourth-year Japanese student who was last year's first place winner of $300, won the contest with his collection of books focused on Japanese cinema.

"At first, I didn't think of it primarily as a collection," Piskatel admitted. "If I'm interested in something, I'll try to get as much information on it as I can. At a certain point, I just realized that I had a collection."

The competition is open to all UCLA students who may think that they have enough books on a focused topic to comprise a collection.

"I just hope students who don't realize they're book collectors will go home and look at their bookshelves and think, 'Hey, maybe I have something here,'" Mariscal expressed.

Organized in 1948 by Lawrence Clark Powell (university librarian) and Robert Campbell (original bookseller to UCLA), the competition is intended to encourage students to read and take an interest in books.

"The Campbells were very specific about supporting students and their pursuits," Mariscal said of the couple who sold books to the UCLA community since 1924.

Avid book collectors themselves, the Campbells opened up a book store in Westwood Village in 1929 when UCLA moved to its current Westwood location.

"The monetary prizes for the contest are funded by an amalgamation of several contributors," Mariscal added. "But the Campbells provided the seed money for the endowment. They were very generous and very involved in the UCLA community."

After their deaths in the 1980s their daughter, Clarice Campbell Olcott, continues to "carry the torch for them," Mariscal explained.

A special additional prize is funded by the Campbells' daughter for a deserving children's book collection.

Sponsors of the competition include the Campbell family, the Friends of the UCLA Library, the Southern California Chapter of the Antiquarian Booksellers Association of America, the Library Staff Association, the UCLA Library and other interested donors.

The competition celebrates its 50th anniversary this year, and contest coordinators hope the tradition continues for a long time. In honor of the anniversary, all of this year's prizes will be doubled in value.

"It's a great thing," Piskatel said. "It's nice to be encouraged in a literary pursuit."

ACKERMAN

The maximum allowance for the building was $5.500 million and to stay within this limit, the guest rooms and dormitory were eliminated. Those arrangements alone were to cost $400,000.

The location for Ackerman was picked for its central spot and the landscape's natural slope, which, many believed would allow for striking architecture.

Over 135,000 square feet make up the assignable square feet inside the building while the outside feet surpass 197,000 square feet.

Despite all money matters and mistakes, the Student Union was ready for use on April 3, 1961, but it would not be officially dedicated until six years later.

On Dec. 6, 1967 the Student Union building finally had found a name – that of William Coit Ackerman.

Mr. "A," as he was affectionately referred to by many, began his relationship with UCLA in 1919 as a student and a tennis coach. When he graduated in 1924, he stayed at UCLA as a coach and a physical education instructor.

In 1932, his Bruin athletic team was the first to win an National Collegiate Athletic Association championship. Eighteen years later, he retired from his coaching position.

Ackerman changed gears and went to work for ASUCLA as their graduate manager and the executive director. His work was completed with ASUCLA when he retired on Sept. 25, 1967.

At his retirement, the student union building was named after him as a tribute to his many years of service to undergraduates at UCLA.

"This may not be the most beautiful student union. However, I can report to you that it is the most used. Fifteen thousand seven hundred forty-eight scheduled events have taken place in the past six years in this union. 1,296,674 persons have attended these scheduled events during this period. We have an average flow of persons through this building amounting to approximately 20,000 a day," Ackerman said in his speech.

Ackerman may have seemed impressed with the number of students using the new student union building, but the students themselves were impressed with other elements.

"We can invite the Democrats and the Republicans to hold their next convention in the ballroom," said Fran O'Brien, a graduate student in music at the time.

"It's the new Westwood Country Club," added Jim Kerr, a senior English student.

The UCLA students of the '60s seemed proud and they had every reason to be. The Ackerman Student Union had one of the largest on-campus book departments in the nation, not to mention two high speed elevators and a public address system.

It was designed to look to the future in architecture and interior, while facilitating almost all of the proposed areas. Also included were music listening rooms, women's and men's lounges, a projection booth, a trophy room and a vending machine room.

But nothing lasts forever and Ackerman Student Union has had many changes over the years, inside and out.

Anne Pautler, director of marketing for UCLA and a graduate student during the '70s, remembers how bad the food was.

"The Coop was really pretty awful," she said. "One of the big changes in the '70s was the food went from truly awful to edible."

The interior decorating also left something to be desired. The Coop had turquoise and orange plastic furniture against white walls. What students now recognize as the Treehouse once was a "sea of tables and chairs." This was created by the drop ceiling and lack of platforms.

Level B lacked the '90s sophistication it has today. Textbooks were in the market section, lecture notes were where the computer store now resides and Pautler adds that "the clothes were funky," nothing students would wear."

One advantage people did have in the '70s was the easy access to Ackerman. Before parking structures and loading docks, there was a gravel parking lot just outside Ackerman. What people drove up to, however, was a blank facade with stairways and lockers.

During the '80s, things changed again. The computer store showed up, but the big controversy, according to Pautler, surrounded the idea of students renting calculators during finals.

When the last construction to improve Ackerman took place in the '90s, seismic improvements fixed the top-heavy building with additions that spread out the weight.

Pautler definitely feels that the new Ackerman has a more aesthetic feel for a pedestrian plaza. "When Westwood Boulevard was closed it was like the ghost of Westwood Boulevard was still there," she said. Since the new building has an angle it creates more of a plaza with a pedestrian area. She adds that she likes the big stairs.

One student who experienced Ackerman during the early '90s also likes what has been done with Ackerman.

"Viewpoint is a good addition for the study space," said 1993 UCLA graduate Jorge Ancorna. While he was going to school in the early '90s, students went to study rooms in Kerckhoff to find a quiet spot.

Ancorna also witnessed the closing of the bowling alley during his time at UCLA, but he said it was rarely used.

What might have changed most for Ackerman is the architecture. Ancorna is "very much in favor" of how the outside appearance of Ackerman has changed.

"It is trying to look like Romanesque architecture," Ancorna said, although he admits that it is a far stretch. "They do have a lot of brick," which Ancorna thinks is a good thing because it ties the building in to other buildings on campus like Royce and Powell Library.

But one thing that Ancorna believes Ackerman lacks is space to just hang out. The Ackerman of old had a lot of recreation space, Ancorna felt, because there wasn't a Wooden Center.

"But the student union is where students should hang out," he said. He suggests putting benches in Ackerman to give students a place to sit. "Most of the area that was open to students has been converted to office space now."

hope to continue good relations with the office of the student regent," said Tomas Sandoval, the president of UCSA.

"Hopefully he will do a good job helping to represent the issues and concerns of students," Sandoval continued.

McClymond sees the student regent as a unique position within the board.

"As a student regent you don't have to worry about any long-term political campaigns," she said.

"Your term is short-lived and you don't have to worry about pleasing others to keep your position," she continued.

UCSA sees the role of the student regent as a representative of the students.

On the other hand, Ray Orquilla, a senior analyst with the UC Office of the President, feels that the student regent has another role.

"There's a misconception out there that every time the student regent speaks, he or she represents the students of the UC system, when in actuality he or she represents the people of California," Orquilla said.

As student regent-designate, Espinoza will sit on the board meetings and participate in the discussions, but will have no voting power until July.

THUMBS UP THUMBS DOWN

Hot food ban hurts market

Thumbs down to the Westwood Village Community Alliance for banning all prepared hot food and craft vendors from the Westwood Farmers' Market. The 60-day moratorium was placed on the vendors at the beginning of the year in order to return the market to its original concept, which was to include farmers and produce only.

Competition is said to be the reason for the removal. Chasin' Chicken was one of the merchants who was said to be unhappy with the competition. Although the council denies that competition is the reason at all, the public thinks otherwise. A survey demonstrated that the public has reacted negatively to the removal. We say let the public decide, not an "alliance" made up of infamous, self-serving Westwood residents. Say, are these the same residents that police businesses like Duet and praise the Westwood Specific plan? We say let the majority (student) opinion prevail, and the minority (anti-student) opinion disappear.

Pledging to help kids

Thumbs up to UC Berkeley's educational outreach program, the Berkeley Pledge. The program has been successful in raising the mathematical scores of students in the Bay Area. The program targets disadvantaged students and offers academic enrichment to facilitate future college educations.

Students in grades K-12 in more than 40 schools have shown improvement on standardized tests and exhibited more self-confidence. It's great to see a program actually making sizeable, positive changes in the lives of students who are hopefully college-bound, and more efforts should be made. UCLA should adopt a similar Pledge program and give the secrets of success to our children in Los Angeles. The more time and energy we put into the children, the brighter our future will be.

Super salads, sports cars and yuppies

LIFESTYLE: No longer is pedestrian green lettuce allowed on posh plates

Daniel Inlender

What has happened to salad these days? Is there anyone else who remembers the plain, old-fashioned, honest salad that graced plates across the nation before the "Greed is Good" decade that was the '80s? Salad without pretense. Salad that said, "Here I am – lettuce, tomato, cucumber, beetroot, raw, cold. Eat me."

Those were the days of days of crisp, pale green lettuce, succulent, full-sized tomatoes that had ripened in the sun, bright purple beetroot fresh from the tin, and cucumbers that unashamedly made you burp. Days of homemade salad-dressing (mayonnaise is of course a foreign word) or, perhaps, vinegar. Days when people were not sure what French dressing might be, and, given the record with their kisses, weren't too keen to find out. Salad days indeed.

Salad of that sort is now just a memory. Like so many other things, pre-'90s salad was pushed aside by a brash, confident new-comer: Yuppie Salad. Salad as Status Symbol.

As is vital for a status symbol, the Yuppie Salad comes in a variety of grades. The primary indicator is the lettuce, or, more accurately, the dominant leafy green stuff (lettuce being too specific a botanical term). Just as no yuppie would drive a boring family car, neither would the yuppie countenance fatally unfashionable pale green lettuce. No. The yuppie eats "Sports Lettuce," in dark green with crinkled spoilers around the edges and, in more extreme cases, dashing purple racing stripes. The suspension tends to be a little less firm. As a rule, the darker the green, the more crinkled the edges, the limpier the leaves – the more expensive the salad.

Crisp pale green lettuce is a family wagon with fake-wood panels. Salad that appears to have been made from actual thistles is a Porsche. A red one. In fact, there is a simple law of Yuppie Salad: The more you pay for it, the more it looks like weeds.

The analogy with the automotive tastes of the yuppie is not perfect. Thankfully, though, another parallelism lurks. No one has yet bred phallic lettuce. When, as historical precedent says it must, the current "limpier is better" trend is reversed and genetic engineering delivers a lengthy lettuce surrogate for latent libido lurking loinwise, it will be the perfect complement to the miniature tomatoes.

Indeed one can imagine such a salad being used to great psychological advantage in the power lunch situation: A couple of deft flicks with the fork to achieve the appropriate arrangement; eye contact with the intended victim; a quick, but clearly deliberate, glance at his trousers; a fleeting expression of smug contempt; and finally a conclusive and impossible to misinterpret crushing of the little red globes. I should think that the message would be transmitted with unequivocal force and fidelity. His stocks might well not be the only thing to slump alarmingly.

> The evolution of salad has taken a rather regressive step.

Of course, there are Yuppie Salad indicators other than high-fashion lettuce and tiny tomatoes. The pretentious presence of petals lurking yellow and orange amongst the greenery (and possibly "purplery") is a sure sign that neither nutritional value nor flavor was the chef's main motivation in determining the composition of the dish. What are they there for? There is rarely enough floral debris to actually determine the flavor, and, when there is, it is rather bitter, and disappointingly like you had imagined flowers might taste. This was the reason you had not been whipping out into the garden with the secateurs at dinner time in the first place.

> There is rarely enough floral debris to actually determine the flavor.

The number of varieties of greenstuff in the Yuppie Salad is often large, and usually directly correlated with the price. This, combined with the presence of stray petals and things that are disturbingly thistle-like, leads to a plausible (and very '80s) theory of the origin of Yuppie Salad.

Imagine the Gordon Gekko of market gardeners. "Traditional lettuce cultivation," he muses to himself whilst reading the financial pages, "requires rows of individual plants which must be carefully planted, watered, weeded and harvested. All of this is necessary to produce uniform, crisp, pale green lettuce. Time-consuming. Labor-intensive. Costly. If only people weren't so fastidious about salad greenery." While on the phone to his salad-broker, he ruminates on this problem. He finalizes the deal to have his clients buy tomatoes from him by number rather than weight, and then the solution hits him. "Market it! Make them want a mish-mash of varieties! If car manufacturers can make people think that it's the height of style to drive around in an unreliable, gas-guzzling, giant penis, this will be a breeze."

It was. The rest is history. Gardener Gekko sacked his lettuce tenders, tossed all the salad greenstuff seeds he had into a paddock, and let it go wild.

Now he simply mows it when he has orders to meet.

The evolution of salad over time has taken a rather regressive step. I remember the days when salad, with dressing on the side, would precede a delicious filet mignon. Nowadays, social standards have forced me to eat this pre-appetizer as a meal. "Souplantation" and the like have

Obnoxious neighbors make life a torment

HABITS: Every antic from spitting to karaoke wears away at precarious sanity

Stephanie Pfeffer

I've tried to hold myself back from writing this column for months now, but I can't handle it anymore. I have to do it. I have to tell everyone at UCLA, in Westwood, and in the world, about the baboons who live beneath me.

I can only hope in my heart that some of you out there can relate to this most obnoxious and troubling problem.

My humble apartment is nothing special. It may be a little bigger than yours, but only because we pay too much money. In a just world, we would actually get paid for living here. Why? Because only four feet below me, even as I sit here at this very moment typing on my computer, reside the most barbaric of men.

I never realized how bad it was until I was once rudely awakened at 8:30 a.m., not by deafening garbage trucks but by my own bed thumping. At first I got excited – had some exotic man come into my room during the night? Was my roommate knocking on the living room wall with homemade pancakes for breakfast? Was I in Vegas on a vibrating bed?

Unfortunately, no.

It was the jerks downstairs playing their music so loud that my bed jiggled with every bass boom. I remember wondering how this early wake-up call could occur in a college apartment complex. Even the guys in "Animal House" didn't get up that early unless they were still awake from the night before. Needless to say, that was the end of my night's sleep.

But the music is the least of it. Everyone and their mom has had awful neighbors with loud music. My baboons, however, win the prize for most annoying behavior to compliment their loud music. Their most recent project involves loud hammering into the ceiling.

Pray, do tell, what could they possibly be hammering into the ceiling? A basketball hoop? I wouldn't be surprised. I know they are well-equipped with basketball paraphernalia because they dribble on the balcony and bounce balls off the walls. Thump. Thump. My life is the "Tell-Tale Heart."

I think a lot of this stems from male group dynamics. When you put a bunch of guys together, you end up with a bunch of idiots. Cackling like wild hyenas at all hours of the day and night, these guys are ridiculous. They are boys trapped in men's bodies. And they are loud. In short, they are the most inconsiderate people I have ever encountered.

Or are they? Perhaps you have actually had worse neighbors during your share of time on this earth. So do me a favor; shed some light on why people continue to act this way – what possesses them to do so? Are they that oblivious to the others that live around them? Do they know I know their intimate secrets and daily routines? Do they even care?

> Do they know I know their intimate secrets and daily routines?

In a sick way, I feel sort of bad for the guys. They stand out on their balcony and call their girlfriends and sisters who come to visit "stupid bitches" as they try to parallel park. They will eventually drop dead of emphysema from the number of cigarettes they smoke. They'll be bankrupt when I sue them for the hole in my throat from their secondhand smoke that wafts through my open window.

Most pitiful, however, is their possession of one of the worst habits known to man. And yes, equal-opportunists, I mean man, because only men do it: spitting. Not I-have-a-piece-of-carpet-fuzz-in-my-mouth-that-I-can't-get-hold-of spitting, but abhorrent, snotty, phlegmy, slobbering spitting. You can't believe I am writing about this? Me neither. But I am so inspired by this act of grossness that I must unleash my "phlegming" fury.

They spit for hours from their balcony. I swear they're out there all the time, right under my window. Probably because it's the most manly part of their apartment – like kings on a throne they keep close watch over their domain. As the testosterone rushes through their mighty bodies, they stand tall, observe wisely, scratch their crotches, and spit over the rail. Not only can I hear them pull the snot up into their throats and hurl it out, but I also have the pleasure of hearing their spit wads splat onto the cement below. Ahh ... a delightful sound to liven up the dinner hour.

Why, men, must you do this? Do you have overproductive phlegm glands?

Please, let me buy you a doctor's appointment! Nervous

Parking paralysis

I'm writing to voice an opinion that popped up as I was reading your article printed on Feb. 17 ("Burglars pinch coveted permits"). I'm actually surprised that there are not many more stolen since parking permits are in priority up there with the As in the science classes here at UCLA. I, being one with a carpool permit, got lucky, but it's still ridiculous that even with a permit I still can't get parking with all those itty-bitty-fit-for-a-moped-spaces in the parking structures.

The bone I had to pick with the article was when the spokesperson for the permits "emphasized that the cost would be worse than if the individual had just bought a permit" when talking about being arrested when found with a stolen permit. Excuse me but it's not like they had a choice of a permit, especially when permits are fought for nail and tooth and cost about a person's first-born child.

Since coming to UCLA, parking is the No. 1 thing that has made my life miserable here and it just makes me madder when people brush it off so lightly and belittle a huge factor of stress for myself and many other students. And one more thing, what's up with those "Blue Permits Only" deal? There are like a dozen cars roaming around the structure trying to find parking and there are these little spaces with those little signs painted on them that are empty – empty! Go figure.

The two nations of classist America

RACE: Analysts too quick to examine wrong parts of African American life

By Kevin Powell

Watching Henry Louis Gates Jr.'s recent PBS documentary on the class division among African Americans was akin to watching tribal warfare in 3-D.

By that I mean to say I expected a thoughtful and serious analysis of the class crisis afflicting African American America, but was left feeling that the African American underclass was mercilessly battered, only this time by members of the African American middle class or, more precisely, the African American intellectual elite.

As someone who is both a product of the African American underclass and, through an incredible amount of effort, a African American professional, I have been fortunate enough to view class problems in African American America from both sides. Moreover, my experiences as a "successful" young African American person – the numerous high-profile, rhetorio-driven panels I've attended on the state of the race, and, yes, all those invitations to Martha's Vineyard – have left me wondering what is wrong, intellectually and spiritually, with the African American middle class.

For my reading of history tells me that Booker T. Washington, W.E.B. DuBois, and Martin Luther King Jr., among others, were forever concerned with, and had an understanding of, the plight of the folks at the bottom, in spite of their individual attainments and the accolades they received from the mainstream. Have we forgotten so quickly, for example, that middle class born-and-bred King planned a poor people's march just prior to his assassination?

> Class interest has supplanted the race question.

made full-fledged attempts at assisting our digestive tracts into deceiving our stomachs that they are, in fact, full off of some weeds with an occasional sliver of turkey on top. I, on the contrary, do not fall for this "healthy lifestyle." I was always taught that life is lived only once, hence the pleasing of taste buds both in bed and at the dinner table is quintessential to existence. No longer will I be intimidated to not order steak and fries at my next lunch interview. Rather, I will proudly pronounce to my server, that his or her bitter-tasting, over-priced green garbage will not be visiting my stomach during that meal.

Well, how has the simple salad-eater responded to all this? Most probably, with the usual insecurity. Petals and thistles? Gosh, this must be a really posh place. Grass-flavored? Must be an acquired taste.

POWELL

As a beneficiary of the civil rights movement, I am completely perplexed by many of today's African American politicians, leaders, ministers, and intellectuals. That sense of doing for self as one does for the community has evaporated and has been replaced by a gigantic "I," as in a self-serving individualism. Why else would we be subjected to a mini-autobiography of Gates inside a documentary ostensibly about African American class issues? And do we really care if Gates was terrified of the African American Panther Party, or that he seems to have been, miraculously, a part of every civil rights organization?

Those points aside, the bigger piece missing from both the documentary and contemporary African American criticism of the African American underclass is an honest assessment of the real victories and losses of the civil rights movement, and how that movement, in more ways than we dare to acknowledge, helped to draw a solid line between the African American middle class and the African American poor.

For how many of these pundits, Gates included, have ever sat down and really asked who benefited from the movement and why? And who did not benefit, and why not? And, was integration and its manifestations really the best thing for African American America? Particularly when it virtually eliminated African American operated facilities and resources and caused the African American underclass to swell out of control?

I submit that in our rush to integrate into America, many African Americans simultaneously abandoned our institutions, our communities, and whatever sense of collectivity we once had. (Or, imagine, if you will, Harvard's cerebral "Dream Team" at a historically African American college like Howard or Hampton instead. What would that have done for the prestige of one of those schools?)

Even if one argues that Washington and DuBois – or Marcus Garvey and DuBois, or Malcolm and Martin – never agreed, I think we can certainly say they were concerned about the standing of African American America. I don't know if I can say that about the current crop of African American spokespersons. Class interest has supplanted the race question, which remains, at least where I come from and where I live in Harlem, as acute as it has ever been.

And those class interests held onto tightly by the African American elite seem to blind them (as in "they," which was used again and again in the documentary in reference to the African American underclass) to a very hard fact: when African Americans jumped ship for integration a generation ago, they also left behind poor African Americans to wallow in despair and powerlessness.

I feel strongly that many urban youth embrace rap culture the way we do, and feel there are little or no possibilities beyond being a rapper, a basketball player, or a street hustler, because that is what we see on a regular basis. Sorry, but we are simply not engaged by many "intellectuals" in Harlem. Not in the way that DuBois once lived and worked here, nor the way Garvey led African American-pride caravans here, nor the way Langston Hughes penned ghettocentric poetry here, nor the way Malcolm X strolled, carefree, through these gritty streets. Those sort of genuine connections don't seem to exist any longer.

Indeed, visit any American inner city and note how few African Americans – young or old – actually know who Gates or William Julius Wilson or Cornel West are. But this African American intellectual sect, under the guise of examining African American America's class divisions, self-righteously give their take anyway, as Gates admits "I find it hard to concede that these young hoodlums are part of the same community I belong to."

The challenge for Gates and the others is this: If you are serious about examining the two nations of African American America, you must also be serious about examining yourselves and your class actions. Otherwise, we are left, again, with armchair quarterbacks who appear to have no vision, and no hope for the whole of African American America.

When all is said and spat, however, the guys beneath me have their cool elements. Some nights when I get especially lucky, they will break out their karaoke set. When they're drunk, it's even more of a treat. They sing and rap like professionals; once I thought Snoop was downstairs! I get all tingly when they deep throat the microphone and their scratchy upper lips brush against it, as they scream "Yo yo yo One two, three four five f– You." My talented baboons.

I don't know what to do about this inconvenience.

I don't know what to do about this inconvenience in my life. I once put a friendly anonymous note on their door. They never turned the music down so I assume they spit in the note and gave it to one of their respected women friends as a Valentine's Day present.

So now what? Dropping a bomb into their living room is an option, but I tend to be nonviolent. So I sit and simmer. Instead of studying I pound my heels into the floor to send them a sign. And I write columns to release my aggression. Will they know that I refer to them? Nah ... you can't teach a baboon to read.

'Brazil 2001' revives surf tunes with '90s rock twist

MUSIC: California band to expose West Coast roots in Westwood show

By Vanessa VanderZanden
Daily Bruin Staff

Bernard Yin saunters into the Gypsy Cafe. He removes his glasses and pulls up a chair. It's time to talk shop.

"Brazil 2001, without a question, we love to wave this flag, we're the bastards of the surf community," Yin jokes. "We don't play just surfy instrumentals like early surf bands did and we don't really want to be pigeonholed as some sort of revivalist surf band."

Playing tonight at the Westwood Brewery, Yin's band, Brazil 2001, will perform their unique brand of '90s surf rock. The 10 p.m. show will take place upstairs from the restaurant, and, like all Tuesday night Brewery concerts, it requires no cover. The "all ages" environment provides a change of pace for easy-going Yin.

"The majority of the venues that I've been playing for quite a while now have been 21 and up, and I don't really think that's what rock 'n' roll's about," Yin concedes with a laugh, his thoughtful eyes roaming the room for the right words. "Rock 'n' roll's not about waiting until you're 21 before you can have a good time."

According to Yin, the Westwood Brewery would be flooded with calls from various upstart bands if the performance space were better advertised amongst local musicians. Yin only heard of the gig while "exchanging secrets" with a fellow co-worker who also plays with a band. Now bordering on being regulars, Yin admits Brazil 2001's previous all-ages performance at the brewery proved to be "kind of awkward."

"I said 'Oh my God. I'm in a roomful of people that for many years now, I've hardly ever had a chance to play for,'" Yin recalls. "It's very humorous for me to play this venue because it's so against the norm for us. Even if it's a shitty show, it's just a blast."

As Brazil 2001 is Yin's "like millionth band" effort, as well as that of the bassist and drummer, he can speak knowledgeably on the over-saturation of rock groups in Los Angeles. Sometimes, Yin claims, even well-known L.A. acts have to put up with small audiences.

"In my opinion, there's no 'best place to play' as much as whether you just happen to play well that night and there was a sufficient quantity of receptive people to feel some sort of response," Yin suggests. "L.A.'s West Side, I think, is going to continually grow as a cool scene and then when we play places like Santa Barbara or San Francisco, people really understand us and have a good time."

In fact, the majority of Brazil 2001's shows take place in California by no chance occurrence. Yin has been a native of the state all but one year of his life, residing in Los Angeles for the past eight. The UCSB alumni recognizes a musical relationship between the Doors, Jane's Addiction and The Dead Kennedys based on their affiliation with the same political boundaries.

"Those are three California bands that are pretty different from one another," Yin accepts. "But to me, when you listen to all three of those, there's this ingredient, called 'California,' that's somewhere hidden, and I think that's something that we've succeeded with with this group. We're distinct to the West Coast, I think, because of the surf."

Already, the band has recorded a track on the Huntington Beach Surf Museum's compilation album. The institution pays homage to the evolution of surfing as a sport, recognizing the rolling, guitar-heavy music as an integral aspect of that tradition. Old-style graphics have become popular as skate and surfboard artwork in recent years, revealing the current trend for surfers to re-embrace the old genre of music.

"Right now, in the past few years, it seems that checking out the traditions of surf culture and its origins are becoming rather hip again," Yin says. "I think surf music as it was developing in the early '60s in Southern California is percolating up to the surface, not only at the mainstream, but also with the surf industry and surf culture.

"Me, as a surfer, and also just as someone who enjoys music, playing instrumental music, it's only natural to dabble with (surf music)," Yin continues.

Citing exposure to Neil Young's "simple songwriting" during Yin's "adolescent melancholy" as a large influence on his musical style, it seems odd that Yin would claim the surf

The rain Saturday night couldn't dampen the explosion one bit.

Some of America's hottest lyrical artists hit the stage to create a surreal night of blazing microphones, arms waving in the air and a positive milieu in an auditorium filled with a diverse class of hip-hop pupils.

Rap artists Ice Cube, Mack 10 and Goodie Mob were among the many performers who turned it out at the African Student Union (ASU) and Cultural Affairs Commission-sponsored Hip-Hop Explosion '98.

The concert is regarded as one of the biggest ever to hit the UCLA campus.

"This is monumental," said Mike Hamilton, UCLA's Cultural Affairs Commissioner. "I think this event is unprecedented, and to have artists this type of caliber is a gift to the students."

In 1992, the first concert was held in the Cooperage food court, showcasing local talent; but the event has grown into a display of the industry's hottest. Past performers include powerhouse groups Outkast, Lords of the Underground and Coolio.

Anticipation was high, mainly for the socially-conscious Goodie Mob and platinum-seller Ice Cube. Though Cube and Mack 10 have received more airplay on local stations, there was as much talk of the Atlanta-based Mob quartet.

The event kicked off with DJ Melo-D, a member of the Beat Junkies DJ crew, spinning hype beats for the gathering crowd. With the heads bobbing to the mixing and turntable tricks, Julio G of radio station 92.3 The Beat stepped onstage as the night's master of ceremonies.

Up first was the Wooddwellas, a Supercat-type duo whose quick lyrics and classic beats (from groups such as the Beastie Boys and Special Ed) started off the show right and were followed by another up-and-coming group Deadly Venom.

The show took off when the Zippo-waving team Militia got hold of the mic. Its hit "Burn" is currently listed as Billboard's 13th hottest rap song.

Along with the hands waving in the air, lighters and fragrant smoke ascended above the crowd and hovered majestically. After the performance Julio G had a few words to say. "Sometimes (the concert) doesn't have to be sold out," he said. "But as long as the crowd is live, that's what it's all about. That's hip-hop."

Though the Ackerman Grand Ballroom was only filled to a third of its capacity, there was plenty of energy to fill the whole place, thanks to an enthusiastic and noticeably diverse crowd.

"It's always been my goal to get all nationalities to enjoy something together," Hamilton said. "If I could define this as one thing, it would be a unityfest."

The implications of the concert were more than the opportunity for students "to get a chance to see artists they would never otherwise see in a safe environment," as Hamilton noted, but an event where individuals of different backgrounds could appreciate an interest they all had in common: good music.

"This is a chance for students to come together," said ASU president Chad Williams. "I think the interests of students are a lot of times ignored and it's up to USAC and ASU to represent their interests."

And those interests were definitively met in the headline acts. Goodie Mob (with members Khujo, Ce-Lo, Big Gipp and T-Mo) got the crowd moving with "Soul Food," but blew it up with the hit, "Cell Therapy."

Much of the group's popularity comes from their conscious narratives like: "My mind won't allow me to not be curious/ My folk don't understand so they don't take it serious/ But every now and then/ I wonder if the gate was put up to keep crime out or keep our ass in."

Ce-Lo took a time-out from the performance to recite some of his poetry to the audience, unaccompanied by music.

Though the dancing had stopped, the listening only

Every passing moment reveals theatrical flaws

DRAMA: Stilted writing and awkward staging overshadow interesting theme

By Sam Toussi
Daily Bruin Contributor

Racism, and not just American racism, has been a deep well for theatrics over the years. Theater educates us as much as it pains us because these stories are not always about external conflict (i.e. one person against another person). Sometimes social and racial problems must be reconciled within one character. "Passing," now playing at the Towne Street Theatre, is a play about just that. Yet the play falls far short of its lofty goals.

The play is set in 1927 New York where a cold, loveless woman named Irene (Lisa Ann Collins), Rene for short, blandly goes through the life it seems her surroundings have forced upon her. Her husband is Brian Redfield (Billy Mayo), a prominent African American doctor and they have two sons. Yet there is something missing in her life. She and her husband sleep in separate rooms and the cold, almost formal relationship they have would appear to be a rut in a long marriage if the marriage had not been cold from the start.

Then, one day, out of the blue, Rene's close childhood friend, Clare (Nancy Cheryll Davis) returns to Rene's life after a few years. Clare is a free spirit and at the same time, deeply disturbed. Abused as a child, she attempts to fill a void in her life.

One thing Clare and Rene have in common is that they are both extremely light African Americans, so much so that they can pass for whites (hence the title). Clare is married to Jack Bellew who has absolutely no idea that his wife is black and he is a racist to boot. The realities of 1920s America make it necessary for them to try and pass as white as often as possible. Sounds promising, huh?

Director Sy Richardson wields this complicated story very poorly in several ways. It's a director's job to capture a play's sense of rhythm and timing. The play features over 25 different scenes with blackouts between every scene. Each blackout lasts about five seconds (which lasts an eternity when you're sitting there in the dark) and disrupts the play anytime it gets a rhythm going. Richardson also saw fit to have his actors change costume an infinite number of times to convey sets that the audience could have easily imagined leaving the actors with broken concentration and even missed cues.

Los Angeles is the farthest thing from a theater city and stages here tend to be small, but that's no excuse to have the actors stand absolutely still through scenes lasting up to five minutes. Richardson, throughout the play, leaves his actors standing two feet apart, perfectly motionless and struggling to express emotions as deep as love and rage. It's like dancing in a straight jacket.

The script itself is rough and coarse, failing to advance the plot at an even rate: at times it is sluggish and at others it

Director strays from serious drama for a change of pace

FILM: 'Palmetto' pays tribute to melodramas rife with sex, temptations

By Renee Graham
The Boston Globe

Volker Schlondorff strolls into the living area of his spacious suite, parks himself in a cushy chair, pours a glass of sparkling water, and prepares to explain.

The acclaimed director has spent three decades fashioning art from the shadows of humankind, adapting such serious literary works as Arthur Miller's "Death of a Salesman," Ernest Gaines's "A Gathering of Old Men," and Margaret Atwood's "The Handmaid's Tale." His best-known film, "The Tin Drum," is an extraordinary, disturbing exploration of the rise of fascism in Germany as seen through the eyes of a young boy who, in a fierce act of protest, wills himself to stop growing.

Schlondorff's films have always been serious, dark and thought-provoking, which is why the filmmaker is spending so much time these days explaining how he wound up making "Palmetto," a sexy, noirish comedy set in a dusty, steamy Florida town.

"Often, I have to explain why I made a movie like this, or how I even know how to make it," Schlondorff joked during a recent visit to Boston. "People may see this as a hair in the soup of the body of my work."

Yet for those who know Schlondorff, 58, the question isn't why he made a film like "Palmetto," but what took him so long. The film, which opened Friday, is an homage to those long-ago melodramas rife with sin and sex, not unlike those Schlondorff used to watch as a boy in his native Germany.

"My friend (filmmaker) Bertrand Tavernier always asks me, 'Why don't you make movies like the ones you go to see?'" Schlondorff said. "When I was 15 or so, I used to sneak away to see these types of movies which we were not supposed to see because they were supposed to be garbage, and I was supposed to go to opera or serious plays or meaningful movies. I don't remember all the titles, but they were always about temptation, money and sex. Those were my motivation for getting into the movies; the higher aspirations came later."

Set in the town of the title, "Palmetto" is based on a 1930s pulp novel, "Just Another Sucker," by Rene Raymond, who wrote crime thrillers under the pseudonym James Hadley Chase. Woody Harrelson stars as Harry Barber, a not-too-bright former journalist fresh out of prison after doing time for a crime he didn't commit. Back on the streets and in the arms of his girlfriend (Gina Gershon), Harry is restless and hurting for cash. Faster than you can say "Barbara Stanwyck," he is seduced by the beautiful, mysterious Rhea Malroux (Elisabeth Shue). Rhea, ably assisted by her tourniquet-tight clothes, persuades Harry to participate in the staged kidnapping of her stepdaughter Odette (Chloe Sevigny) to shake down her ailing but richer-than-Oprah husband, Felix (Rolf Hoppe), for $500,000. For his role, Harry is promised a cool $50,000 – easy money to a shlub like Harry, but, of course, nothing in Noir-land is ever that easy.

Schlondorff joyfully describes his latest movie, written by E. Max Frye, who also penned the loopy Jonathan Demme film "Something Wild," as "unabashed trash." He was attracted to the project simply because "it was so light" and would offer a breather from the "more serious, politically engaged" films on which he has built his career.

He's been looking for such a project for years, but others, such as an adaptation of a Dashiell Hammett mystery, never came to pass.

"Always at the last moment these pictures would get canceled," he said, "probably because the producers didn't trust that I could do it."

Although there is a real Palmetto, Fla., Schlondorff shot his film in other parts of the state. He was less interested in re-creating an actual place than in capturing the proper atmosphere for this tale. It's the kind of place where everyone sweats profusely, where soaked clothing clings to every curve, where ceiling fans turn only to toss elusive shadows.

"This genre of film doesn't happen in the real world. These are imaginary places – either seedy back alleys in Manhattan and Brooklyn, or a Florida setting with palm trees and decaying houses," he said. "It's movie-land, set in a world completely in the mind."

"Palmetto" is Schlondorff's biggest American release. At its height, "The Tin Drum" played on 80 screens; "Palmetto" opened on 1,300. "This for me is a day at the races," he said with a Cheshire cat smile. "I didn't think I could still have new experiences in life."

Although he has made other films with American settings – for example, the rural South of "A Gathering of Old Men" – this movie marks Schlondorff's deepest excursion into what he calls "the spirit of American popular culture." Like many Europeans born during World War II, Schlondorff was profoundly affected by the American soldiers who remained in Germany after the war.

"We loved (the soldiers) because they defeated our parents, so they were natural allies," he said, with a laugh. "There were more American men than German men, about 150,000 GIs in our area. All of us kids were fascinated by anything and everything American. I didn't like the culture of my parents, but who does like their parents' culture?"

In short, Schlondorff could no longer sit quietly listening to Beethoven and Mozart when Charlie Parker and Dizzy Gillespie were reinventing the world with bebop. Opera seemed stiff and staid, compared with Richard Widmark tossing a wheelchair-bound woman down the stairs in 1947's "Kiss of Death" or Gloria Grahame's world-weary bad girl in 1953's "The Big Heat." That infusion of new, daring art encouraged Schlondorff to study filmmaking.

In 1980, the Academy Awards recognized Schlondorff's "The Tin Drum," as best foreign film. (The film also shared, with "Apocalypse Now," the Palme d'Or for best film at the Cannes Film Festival.) Now, nearly 20 years after Schlondorff mesmerized audiences with his surreal, masterful film, based on the Gunter Grass novel, he finds the film at the center of controversy in Oklahoma City.

In June, police confiscated a videotape of the film from a man's home after a judge ruled the film was child pornography under Oklahoma law. At the heart of the debate is a scene of oral sex between a young boy and an older girl, which prompted the conservative Oklahomans for Children and Families to deem the film obscene. The man whose tape was confiscated was Michael Camfield, who also happens to be development director for the state American Civil Liberties Union. He has filed a civil suit against the city. The trial begins this spring.

When word of the brouhaha reached Schlondorff in Berlin, where he lives with his wife and daughter, he thought it was a joke. But when he was contacted by attorneys to give an affidavit via fax about the making of the film, he realized just how serious the situation had become.

"I had to talk about how the scenes were shot, what the ages of the actors were," he said. "How naive they are. In 33 years, unfortunately, I've never seen sex on a movie set. That's not the way it's done.

Turning more serious, Schlondorff added, "I thought this is not possible in America. But it's part of a whole political strategy. Certain people want to impose their values on others. Still, it is proof that this film is still vibrant."

For five years, Schlondorff has been overseeing the $100 million renovation of Babelsberg, the fabled German studio where such classics as Fritz Lang's "Metropolis" and Josef von Sternberg's "The Blue Angel" were made. But he is eager to make another film, although he isn't sure whether he wants to return to serious subjects or take another frothy whirl with a lighter film like "Palmetto."

"My friend Ernest Gaines wants me to make a film of his splendid novel, 'A Lesson Before Dying.' I told him there's so many young black directors now, couldn't one of them do it?" Schlondorff said. "And he said, 'They're not interested, they want to make gangster movies.' And I said, 'Me, too.'"

FILM: "Palmetto" is now playing in theaters.

Taiwan Rejects China's Claims to Our Island Nation: A Statement for the Remembrance of "2-28", Taiwanese Holocaust in 1947

This year is the 50th anniversary of The declaration of Human Rights of U.N. One of the key elements in the Declaration is the principle of self-determination: "nobody but the people themselves have the right to determine their future." Based on this universal principle, Taiwanese reject Chinese claims to our island nation.

This year is also the 51st anniversary of "2-28", Taiwanese Holocaust. The date "February 28" is etched into the hearts and minds of the Taiwanese people like the word "Holocaust" in the history of Jewish people. On this day, 51 years ago, a popular demonstration for democracy and justice took place in the capital Taipei, but was brutally crushed, resulting in an island-wide slaughter of 30,000 Taiwanese by Chiang Kai-shek's Chinese Nationalist, or Kuomintang (KMT), troops. Thus began 40 years of repressive martial law on the island, during which Chiang ruled the Taiwanese with iron fist.

The sacrifice of the men and women in 1947 has since been the driving force behind the Taiwanese struggle for genuine democracy and freedom, a struggle which has borne fruit in recent years. Nevertheless, Taiwan's democracy now faces serious external threat from China, which has repeatedly threatened to "liberate Taiwan with bloodbath" should Taiwan declare her formal independence. Based on our love for our homeland, we of the Taiwanese Student Association at UCLA solemnly remind all that Taiwan is not a part of China, and we call for international support for self-determination. Nobody but the people of Taiwan has the right to determine the future of Taiwan!

An Overview of the 2-28 events of 1947.

After the end of World War II, the Allied Forces left the occupation of Taiwan to Chiang, who was still holding on to large parts of China with his Nationalist forces. The Taiwanese, who had been under Japanese rule from 1895 through 1945, initially welcomed the Chinese Nationalist forces. But, their joy soon changed into sorrow and anger, when the new authorities turned out to be repressive and corrupt.

The 28 February 1947 arrest of a woman selling cigarettes without a licence triggered large-scale public protests against Chinese monopoly of political power and economic means. Forced into hiding, the appointed governor Chen Yi called for reinforcement. Upon arrival in early March, the troops started rounding up and executing people, focusing in particular on the intelligentsia. Aside from the numerous dead, thousands more were systematically arrested and imprisoned in the White Terror campaign which took place in the following decade. Many of these remained imprisoned until the early 1980s.

Taiwan Is Not A Part of China

Throughout the 80s, protest against the KMT and Marital Law erupted. In 1986, the Democratic Progressive Party (DPP) was formed, and in 1991, the DPP officially incorporated a pro-independence charter in its platform. The tremendous support for independence in Taiwan shows that the time is ripe for the democratic movement to reach its ultimate conclusion: self-determination and independence for the 21 million people of Taiwan.

The history of Taiwan has been one of external exploitation, from the first Portuguese exclamation of "Ilha Formosa!" ("beautiful island"), through the Dutch, Spanish, Ch'ing imperial, Japanese and Nationalist Chinese regimes. Despite what reality dictates, China still mistakenly regards Taiwan as part of its sovereign territory. Taiwan has never been part of China; except for the brief of 1887-1895. The People Republic of China (PRC) has, since its establishment, never ruled Taiwan for a single day!

The Teletubbies are coming! The Teletubbies are coming!

TELEVISION: British show aimed at preschoolers expected to invade U.S.

By Keith Marder
Los Angeles Daily News

First it was John, Paul, George and Ringo. Next came Ginger, Scary, Posh, Baby and Sporty – those ubiquitous Spice Girls.

Now, get ready for the next British Invasion: Tinky Winky, Laa-Laa, Dipsy and Po – a.k.a. the "Teletubbies."

Like those who came before them, these four sing (albeit somewhat incomprehensible children's ditties) and dress alike. For the Beatles, it was collarless jackets. The Spice Girls tend toward the tight and barely there. And the Teletubbies' fashion statement? Furry suits, televisions in their tummies and antennae on their heads.

They're hot. They're huggable. And they're crossing the big pond on April 6.

Barney, beware. Your post atop the nursery school must-see TV list is about to be usurped by a cuter and less annoying quartet of PBS stars already a smash overseas.

The only thing in the purple dinosaur's favor is the taint of strife surrounding the terry-clothed creatures.

Controversy No. 1: It's billed as the first show aimed at children from birth to age 4. Critics ask: Should toddlers be watching TV at all, let alone have their own show?

Controversy No. 2: Teletubbies speak in baby-talk, saying things like "uh-oh" and "Tinky Winky hungry." Critics ask: Does this hamper linguistic development?

"The differentiation here is the entertainment value vs. the educational value," said Gordon Pradl, professor of English education at New York University. "Young children can certainly get hooked, but the educational value is suspect because it's really important to understand that the adult language is necessary in the environment for children, even when the young child is not speaking adult language."

But executive producer and series creator Anne Wood says the nonsensical babble of her Teletubbies actually stimulates language development.

"Teletubbies have a play language, which children share and try to imitate," Wood said. "Baby talk is a very necessary stage in average speech. If a child does not have it, it is difficult to learn how to speak. They don't have muscles in their tongue to speak yet at this stage of development. 'Uh-oh' is some of the first sounds."

E. Audrey Clark, a family studies specialist in the field of environmental sciences at California State University, Northridge, notes that the Tubbies are creatures of few words, but the sounds they do make may be enough to spark more debate.

"They tend to play with sounds. Children, particularly 1 and 2 years old, enjoy playing with sounds. What they have done is consistent with child development theory." Clark said.

And, in defense of programming for toddlers, proponents of the show say television is often, out of necessity, used as a baby sitter anyway. So, if they must be exposed to the tube, better an age-appropriate show geared toward a young child's developmental level than other fare intended for older kids.

"Teletubbies" debuted in Britain a little less than a year ago, so there haven't been any studies on its effects yet. But series creator Wood is expecting many to come. She is expecting, of course, positive results.

Wood, a British educator, has spent years studying children and watching them watch her shows. Her other series, "Tots TV," which already airs on PBS in the United States, has won two BAFTAs, the British Emmy, for best preschool series.

"Tots," which is aimed at a slightly older crowd (children ages 3 to 6) has sensibilities similar to "Teletubbies." "Tots," which debuted in the United States in October 1996, features three puppets – Tilly (who speaks only Spanish), Tom and Tiny – who live and learn in a secret house in the woods. Devices such as repetition are used, and the show is designed to instill confidence.

Wood's four brightly colored Teletubbies have the same aim. They frolick in a lush green meadow, bash bellies, chase a talking vacuum cleaner, alternately listen to and ignore the authoritative voice trumpets, garner reaction from a computer-generated sun with the face of a baby, and eat tubby toast and tubby custard.

Every action is deliberate, says Wood. The baby talk, the repetition of songs, even the quiet moments during scenes on each show. Because the core audience members can think but not speak, Wood said she needed to allow time on the show for children to ponder what's going on.

One of the most unusual aspects of the show is the way real children are portrayed, playing, singing and dancing on television screens on the tubbies' stomachs.

"Children, real children, are at the center of their universe," Wood said.

Whatever the reason, the show has been sold internationally and is gigantic in Britain. A music single released from the show shot up to No. 1 on the British pop charts, supplanting the Spice Girls for two weeks.

And, in the true test of British fame, the people inside of the Teletubby suits have been investigated by the country's tabloid newspapers, which also went to great lengths to uncover the story behind the firing of the actor who plays Tinky Winky and find the top-secret production location.

Controversies notwithstanding, in less than two months, "Teletubbies" likely will become an addiction for very young children.

genre for his own. Yet, even more peculiar for a mellow, guitar-playing surfer is that he would work both for an attorney's office and as a web site programmer by day. While the other two members maintain secure jobs with the software industry and the world of video editing, all would prefer to rely solely on Brazil 2001 for their livelihood.

"One of the angles we're interested in exploring is applying our music to soundtracks," Yin says in response to commercial options. "A lot of surf videos have used us already, and ironically because they're generally not known to do so, and some major film use. From a capitalist angle, you can get a song placed in a movie, and even if they lowball you, you're still going to get paid more than you would for half a dozen shows."

But how can the band lose with such a great name? Though "Brazil 2001" was chosen for the science fiction movies "2001: A Space Odyssey" and "Brazil," the band members' reasons signify something deeper than mere film fandom. The name "looks good on a flyer."

"Well, 2001 has, well, maybe just because we dig it," Yin elaborates. "I think "Brazil" was interesting because it painted this weird, cynical picture of the future. Maybe in sort of a punk tradition, we're cynics as well."

Yet, despite the impact of Brazil 2001's social commentary and jamming riffs, Yin, true to form, laughs, "I'd rather be surfing."

Biola University presents

THE CHRISTIAN UNIVERSITY IN THE NEXT MILLENNIUM

Why did prestigious Christian universities such as Harvard and Yale surrender to secularism?

How do Christian universities maintain academic integrity while still remaining faithful to Christ?

In celebration of Biola University's 90th Anniversary, an academic conference featuring renown lecturers and authors will come together to discuss the role of the Christian university in the new century!

Join guest lecturers

intensified. He flowed on race consciousness and self understanding.

The Mob, which formed in 1993 was recently acclaimed the "hypest live show" by Vibe Magazine.

"We're happy the crowd responded the way they did," Big Gipp said.

They weren't the only ones to whom the crowd responded. Mack 10, a native of Inglewood, took the spotlight next and delivered huge, as anticipated. He ignited the crowd with "Foe Life," a hit track produced by Ice Cube.

In response to Mack 10's chanting of "Mack 10 is the lick, West Side is the clique" a patrolling security guard answered in unison with the roaring crowd "Can't get enough of that gangster shit!"

"Our music is tight," Mack 10 said, offstage. "People can't deny it."

The grand finale came with the appearance of Ice Cube himself.

He busted onto stage to share it with Mack 10, his companion in the recently formed group West Side Connection.

As soon as the music for his song "It Was a Good Day" started to play, peace and Westside hand signals pumped in the air along with Ice Cube's smooth lyrics. Though he hasn't released a solo album in almost four years, he can still rock the show.

"People show us love wherever we go," Ice Cube said. "Besides, we don't go places we're not wanted. We're always gonna rock an L.A. crowd."

His presence was definitely in demand as fans cheered him to perform more tracks. One crowd member threw her bra on stage to show her appreciation of Ice Cube and Mack 10.

"Stuff like that goes on all the time," Mack 10 said. "It lets me know something ain't going right if it ain't going down like that."

It was definitely a good day – for both hip-hop and the UCLA student body. The show was evidence that USAC is still working for the enrichment of the campus, according to Hamilton. Speaking on behalf of ASU and the Cultural Affairs Commission, Williams simply said, "We made it happen."

PASSING

moves too quickly to adequately express any emotion. Also, didn't they have contractions like "doesn't" and "wouldn't" in the 1920s? Sheri Bailey, the scribe of "Passing," would like you to believe that there weren't. That might not seem like a big deal, but the actors are obviously confused and tripped up by the unusual, deliberate dialogue that every character in the play speaks.

So that brings us to the actors. They have been failed by their director and their playwright. Collins and Davis explore a unique dynamic but barely scratch the surface before the play blows the whistle on them. Halfway through the Act 2, the play takes a violent twist and leaves its racial theme in the dust and degenerates into a melodramatic love triangle. The problem is that by the time the twist comes, the actors are left with such an abrupt curve that they don't have the emotional resource to play the rest of the show with sincerity.

One performer who provides a spark is Tomas Boykin who plays Albert Brickhouse, a childhood friend of both Clare and Rene. He often asks them, "Are you white or black today?" It's funny but it's the only time the play deals with the problems of passing effectively. Unfortunately, it's as effective as it is comic, leaving a promising play mired in its own ineptitude.

THEATER: "Passing" runs through March 29 at the Towne Street Theatre, 799 South Towne Ave. Tickets are $15, $10 for students.

How to Write an Effective Ad
- Start your ad with the merchandise you are selling. This makes it easier for readers to quickly scan the ads and locate your items.
- Always include the price of your item. Many classified readers simply do not respond to ads without prices.
- Avoid abbreviations—make you ad easy for readers to understand.
- Place yourself in the reader's position, ask what you would like to know about the merchandise, and include that in the ad. Include such information as brand names, colors and other specific descriptions.

The ASUCLA Communications Board fully supports the University of California's policy on nondiscrimination, no medium shall accept advertisements which present persons of any origin, race, sex, or sexual orientation in a demeaning way or imply that they are limited to positions, capabilities, roles, or status in society. Neither the Daily Bruin nor the the ASUCLA Communications Board has investigated any of the services advertised or the advertisements represented in this issue. Any person believing that an advertisement in this issue violated the Board's policy on nondiscrimination stated herein should communicate complaints in writing to the Business Manager, Daily Bruin, 118 Kerckhoff Hall, 308 Westwood Plaza, Los Angeles, CA 90024. TODAY'S CROSSWORD PUZZLE

Good morning, sunshine. Well today it looks more like good afternoon, sleepy head! This particular person of privilege seems to be having some trouble with her morning routine. The night before she demonstrated her social graces with her fellow sociables by snoozing (and dozing) at an informal social gathering of some of the most prominent Pubis on campus. However, it looks like she's going to have a hard time making it to her social studies lecture on time. Not to say that she has no class, but the one she has today will suffer due to her so-called social standing. Etiquette, dignity, exquisite manners, and all other amenities have been lost in a morning of misery that started the first time the alarm went off (more or ten steps of the snooze button earlier). Is she in for social ostracism? Sure she is. Is she a social outcast? No, of course not! But she might suffer from a common social disease. Some people feel that they have to get fall down drunk to have a good time. But aren't they more than that? They risk themselves the ugly old question: "Why did I drink so much?" Or they declare the ultimate in social statements: "I'll never do that again!" The cure to this oh so common ailment is quite simple, don't over-do it dumb ass! Most UCLA students drink four or less when they party. Some don't drink at all, due to his class consciousness. When you're done it, you're done.

8400 Apartments for Rent

why run all over the place when you have free access to apartment listings here on campus? looking for a place to live can be a real drag, and it's not like you've got all the time in the world. so who wants to drive around with their head out the window trying to read the type on those tiny "FOR RENT" signs? how are you supposed to know what an apartment will cost in Santa Monica or Brentwood or Palms? and is it close to the bus? wouldn't it be great if there was an office on campus that kept track of all that stuff for you? well maybe this is your lucky day because community housing does all that and more. you can look at apartment listings, or maybe you want to share a house with a couple friends. find a roommate on-line even. you know you have free access to all this as a ucla student. you can even post listings for free or pick up some bus schedules. just give us a call at 825-4491. it wouldn't be a bad idea to get some info on how to get all of your security deposit back either since the only thing you need more than extra time, is extra money.....

Langdon's shot?

Take your pick: el foldo, playing out the string, hanging 'em up, waving the white flag.

Those towels the UCLA bench is notorious for? They didn't wrap them around their heads, they threw them in.

Kris Johnson told the Los Angeles Times, "We're not a team of quitters. Anybody on this team should be shot if they think like that."

It looks like the Associated Press poll voters would agree with the impression that Sunday's debacle was more than simply a loss to a superior team.

Usually, when a lower-ranked team loses to a higher-ranked team, especially on the road, they would slip maybe two or three spots in the rankings.

We dropped six.

The UCLA Bruins are the movers and shakers of the week, friends, falling from 12th to 18th in the latest AP polls.

These pollsters think that Cincinnati, Mississippi, and Texas Christian (mascot: the Horned Frogs) are better than us.

Say what you will about the polls not meaning anything before March, but they do reflect how the nation perceives your program and where it's heading.

And our sturdy squad ranks somewhere with the U.S. Olympic Hockey team right now.

People aren't going to remember the spanking the Bruins gave to Cal State Fullerton or the win over Oregon St. on the road. They're going to remember watching their team go on national television with a chance to light a fire under its national championship hopes, and wasting it.

The worst part in all of this, more depressing than the loss, more upsetting than our team's lack of character coming into specific relief, was that Dick Vitale actually sounded like he knew what he was talking about.

"It doesn't really faze me," Wayne said about the raucous fifth inning. "I was trying to get guys out as quickly as possible. If anything, the cheering pushed me a little harder, making me throw the pitches I needed to throw."

Stanford pitchers did what they had to all weekend – pitch effectively, while UCLA struggled to keep up with the colossal Cardinal squad.

SANTORA

This allows Santora to remain more relaxed and bring his wit and playful personality onto the field.

"When you're out there on the field things are so crazy," Santora said. "You have to be into the game and so mentally focused to play and be ready for every pitch that it would drive you nuts if you didn't laugh a lot out there and enjoy it. And that's what we do. We have a lot of fun."

All Santora wants to do is play. Whether he has a good day or a bad day, playing baseball is the ultimate goal. Santora believes everyone hits streaks and he considers his scorching hitting early in the season one of those streaks.

Therefore, due to the law of averages, a slump could come soon and Santora's belief in streaks will keep him from getting down on himself.

"When it's over, he has the ability to put the game behind him," his father Victor Santora said. "If he has a bad game today, he won't carry it onto the next game tomorrow. And it's funny, because I remember that even in little league he played hard and he'd sweat and be like a throwback player in the 20s. And all he cared about after the game was to go to McDonald's."

One of the advantages of being small is that you're able to keep everything in perspective. Santora knows his job on the field and in the grand scheme of things. He wanted to be drafted by a major league club ever since he was young and now the dream is so close he can taste it.

giate team, which is now approaching mid-season.

"I'm concentrating right now on our collegiate women's team," Baker said. "We have a great thing going with our team, so I don't want to take anything away from that."

Since there is no time conflict between Baker's dedication to his national and collegiate teams, he has had encouraging responses from the UCLA athletic department.

"The department has been supportive of me ever since I attempted for the national head coaching position."

After the end of the collegiate women's season, Baker will then turn his focus to the national women's team. Although he is very excited about his position, he says he'll have no time to celebrate.

"I'm getting too old to celebrate! I know the amount of work that's going to be done before the national team starts practicing. Celebration's going to be done once we qualify for the Olympics, and then we won't celebrate until after the Olympics."

CALIFORNIA SPORTS

Sonics 101, Clippers 100

Vin Baker scored 27 points and Gary Payton recovered from a cold start with eight of his 12 points in the final four minutes as the Seattle SuperSonics beat the Los Angeles Clippers 101-100 Monday night.

Los Angeles lost for the seventh consecutive time and 15th time in 16 games despite 24 points from Lamond Murray and a season-high 10 3-pointers.

The Clippers, who attempted a season-high 26 shots from 3-point range the last time the Sonics came here on Dec. 16, tried 19 this time. Darrick Martin made three of them in the final 6:33, the last one giving the Clippers a 97-91 lead with 2 1/2 minutes left.

Payton, who missed eight of his first nine shots, capped a 10-0 run with his second 3-pointer of the fourth quarter and a breakaway layup for a 101-97 lead with 33 seconds to play.

Eric Piatkowski's third 3-pointer capped his 19-point effort with 15 seconds left. The Clippers then controlled a jump ball and Martin shot a 3-point attempt over Hersey Hawkins off an inbounds play, but the ball caromed off the back rim as time expired.

Pistons 111, Kings 85

After a rough road trip following the All-Star break, the Detroit Pistons are hoping to find some comfort at home.

Grant Hill had 28 points and 13 rebounds in just 31 minutes as the Pistons routed the Sacramento Kings 111-85 Monday night.

It was the opener of a three-game homestand for Detroit, which plays Charlotte and Cleveland later this week.

"This is a chance to finally put five or six wins together and make a run," said Jerry Stackhouse, who scored 15 points for the Pistons. "Charlotte's struggling a bit, and Cleveland's not playing that well, so those are both games we can win."

When the Pistons acquired Stackhouse from Philadelphia on Dec. 18, they thought he would help turn around their disappointing season. But Detroit went 1-4 on its recent road trip and is mired in next-to-last place in the Central Division with a 25-29 record.

"It's not even fair to say this season has been like a treadmill," said Hill, who also had five assists. "You can always get off a treadmill."

Brian Williams added 19 points and Joe Dumars had 14 for Detroit, which led by as many as 31 points in the fourth quarter.

Van Exel may need surgery

The Los Angeles Lakers team physician has recommended Nick Van Exel undergo diagnostic arthroscopic surgery, a procedure which would probably cause the All-Star point guard to be out at least two weeks.

Van Exel has sat out his team's last three games – two due to the soreness and a clicking sensation in his right knee, and the other because of illness.

Dr. Steve Lombardo recommended diagnostic surgery after examining Van Exel on Monday.

"Nick will make that decision in the very near future," team spokesman Raymond Ridder said, adding that Van Exel might seek a second opinion.

"At this point in time, we are not commenting on how long Nick will possibly be sidelined if he undergoes the surgery simply because we don't know what the diagnosis will be," Ridder said. "The one thing we do know is Van Exel won't play in Milwaukee tomorrow."

Santora talks to his dad about baseball on a regular basis. His most enjoyable series are every time he travels back home to the Bay Area and plays both Cal and Stanford.

That's one of the few times his devoted father and ex-coach gets to watch him.

"My dad is a nut," Santora said. "He's a nut. He went to all my games in high school and little league and then I decided to come down to Southern California to go to college and he was crushed because that was it – boom. He wasn't coming to see any more games. So he makes up for it by calling the press box every game four or five times.

"I have no problem with that. I think it's great. It saves me a lot of time talking to him after the game."

His father was actually happy that Santora chose UCLA. As a high school coach, he sent three football players that started at UCLA and his best friend was once the captain of the UCLA football team. But it's still not easy for Victor Santora to be miles away from his son.

Victor Santora calls the press box almost every game in order to find out how his son is doing in the game.

"I know he's playing and I want to be there so bad to see it and I can't," he explains.

He also manages to call the press box just about when his son is about to bat. Jack Santora says his father may have the force. Victor Santora has a much simpler explanation: having been a coach, you get a feeling as to when things are going to happen.

With his sixth sense and all one would think Victor Santora could watch his son do anything. But there is one thing that his father can never quite do as a coach or a fan: watch Jack hit.

"Every time Jack came up or every time I coached him, I never watched him hit," Victor Santora said. "I always turned my head. I can't watch him. Once I hear the crack of the bat, then I look ... Defensively I have no problem watching. But offensively, I just wait until the crack of the bat."

People who saw Santora bat against Cal State Dominguez, though, were pleasantly surprised with the first official at-bat of the Bruins in 1998. Santora drilled a ball into straight center field for his first and only homer of the season.

Thanks to a devotion to weight training in the off-season, thoughts of many more home runs passed through Santora's mind. But 59 at bats later, Santora is still stuck at one.

That fact, though, doesn't prevent Santora from looking for the long ball.

"I visualize home runs a lot," Santora said. But having three total home runs in his career here you wouldn't think that's the way he thinks.

"Every time I go up to the plate, my mind is always saying 'I'm going to get a fastball and I'm going to rip one.'"

Power won't get him drafted and both Santora and his father realize this. Therefore, Santora has worked on his versatility to make him more appealing to major league scouts.

"He knew with his size he had to do things that a lot of bigger guys didn't do – like switch hit, run faster and throw harder," Victor Santora said. "Things that teams would have to say why they would want to take Jack over a bigger guy. And I think for his size – of course I'm very biased – I think he does very well for his size."

Santora spent a lot of times with father and brother and a whiffle bat. He gives 100 percent every time out only because it's impossible to give 101 percent.

After all of his hard work and dedication, Santora would welcome a change in his lifestyle. Last week after a seven-hour bus ride back from the Bay Area, Santora had to take one of the three midterms he had that week. He also had to turn in a paper and get ready for top-ranked Stanford.

Talking to a lot of good friends from last year's squad that now are in the minor leagues and trying to reach the majors, Santora's desire to reach his dream has heightened.

"If I happen to get drafted I would love to get out of school for a while," Santora said. "I talked to all of them and they all loved it. They said it was kind of rough, but it's so much just walking up and playing every day. That would be unreal."

His size will make scouts shy away from drafting him. That only makes Santora work harder for what he wants: to prove to others that he belongs.

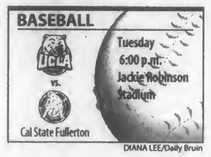
Defensive failings let upset slip through Bruins' fingers

BASEBALL: Top-ranked Stanford justifies rating by sweeping UCLA series

By Kristina Wilcox
Daily Bruin Staff

Patience almost paid off for UCLA baseball fans on Sunday night when the team loaded the bases with one out and was in the position to tie the score with Stanford.

But Cardinal closer Tony Cogan slammed the door on the Bruin rally by striking out cleanup hitter Eric Byrnes and forcing a fly-out by Chase Utley.



DIANA LEE/Daily Bruin

Stanford (13-0-1, 3-0 in Six-Pac) swept the three-game series by winning the finale, 12-9, showing why they are the top-ranked squad in the nation.

Sunday's contest was delayed for three hours because of rain and poor playing conditions on the field.

The 322 people who showed up for the game got in for free because of the delay, and were treated to a closer game than the previous two had been, 18-6 and 23-4.

As before, UCLA (7-7, 2-3) had the lead at some point in the game but blew it because of poor infield fielding and struggling pitching.

"If our pitching fails us, then the infield defense should step up, but they didn't this weekend," UCLA head coach Gary Adams said.

In the case of Sunday's game, the Cardinal pushed two runs across in the first inning, and the Bruins came back to tie in the bottom of the inning. UCLA got the lead in the bottom of the second, but Stanford came up with four runs on the top of the third, and kept the lead for good.

"We've done a really good job with the bat," Stanford head coach Mark Marquess said after the game.

Despite the relatively low-scoring battle between the two squads, the series finale lasted for over four hours. Friday's 24-run blowout lasted 3:39 and Saturday's 23-4 fiasco was 3:42 long.

The bottom of the fifth inning was especially excruciating for the fans and the UCLA bench, as the inning lasted thirty minutes overall.

Cardinal reliever Justin Wayne (2-0) labored meticulously against four batters. He worried consistently about the baserunner, Byrnes, throwing a countless number of times to first base. Before the end of the inning, Byrnes worked his way over to third on a stolen base and balk. But Wayne prevailed in the end, striking out the last two batters.

In the meantime, jeers and cheers radiated from around the stadium. The crowd jeered Wayne, hoping that he would speed things up, while the UCLA bench eventually started cheer-

AARON TOUT/Daily Bruin

Despite his size, Jack Santora is a big contributor as lead-off hitter for the Bruins.

Jack of all trades

BASEBALL: Bruin proves that size doesn't matter when realizing a dream

By Vytas Mazeika
Daily Bruin Staff

All the freshmen pull tarp, give hot dogs to umpires after the game, carry bags on road trips and carry balls while on the road to Long Beach, Loyola Marymount, Fullerton, among other places.

Then an umpire who underestimated Jack Santora's baseball abilities due to his size, made a simple but huge mistake.

"As freshmen, we had all the low-rank jobs that no one wants to do and someone has to do," Santora explained. "We were playing in the game ... I don't know who it was. It could've been anybody. It was just a random game and it was my job that day to take umpires balls in between innings when they need them. So I'm doing that all day and after the game we have to give hot dogs to the umpires in the locker and I go on and give them their hot dogs and one of the looked at me and said to me 'Good job bat boy.' And I just started busting up."

Santora also found the experience embarrassing at the time, but the humor of the situation did not get past him. But what could Santora do about the umpire's mistake? He simply had to go out on the field next year and prove that he belongs.

At five feet, nine inches and 160 pounds, Santora is not an imposing figure.

He is not the prototypical baseball player. That title belongs to former Bruins like Eric Karros of the Dodgers, Troy Glaus of the Angels and current Bruin Eric Byrnes. Therefore, Santora must fight to prove himself on the field. With his stature, people are just looking for a reason to say he's too small.

So far this year, Santora belongs.

"We will find a spot for his bat in the lineup," UCLA hitting coach Vince Beringuele said. "He has really solidified his swing and knows what his swing will do; he has pretty much perfected it."

The spot assigned to Santora this year is the leadoff spot. He is a catalyst for the offense and has the responsibility to get on base any way he can. Prior to the Stanford series this weekend, Santora was hitting .340 with an on-base percentage of .393. His thirteen runs scored were tied for the team lead and his 17 hits ranked him second on the team.

"We need Jackie," UCLA head coach Gary Adams said. "He's the spark-plug to our offense. He gets on base a lot and is a great team guy that will do anything for the team."

That "anything" includes moving around on the field. His freshman year Santora played shortstop. His sophomore year Santora played third base.

This year he will play second base until regular second baseman Nick Theodorou's hamstring heals.

Second base is just fine with Santora. The fact that at second life is a little bit less hectic is ideal for a guy like him. There is not as much pressure to make the spectacular play like at shortstop and third base.

Halftime horror, Duke debacle can't simply be swept under rug

COLUMN: Bruins folded when national spotlight focused on their talent

Let's get right to the point, there is no way Duke is 36 points better than UCLA. It's that simple.

There is no way any team in the country should beat a team as talented as the Bruins by 36 points. Ever. That's just absurd.

Mark Shapiro

But it did happen, which says that something else was going on yesterday, something much more insidious than one team simply beating another.

Look, people could understand a loss to Duke, especially on the road.

But a team with as much talent, as much hype, and as high an impression of itself as the Bruins should never put on a display like it did yesterday.

No team worth its salt (or a top-25 ranking) should get pummeled like UCLA did, even once.

And now it's happened twice in one season.

What went on in that locker room at halftime for goodness sakes? Where was the spit and fire, the "Eye of the Tiger?" Where was one of Lavin's motivational speeches to get the team fired up, to remind them that 22-point halftime deficits are unacceptable?

Where was the spirit, pride, or self-esteem that would inspire the Bruins, who we all know are capable of greatness, to at least make some effort at making the game respectable?

This void raises the question, did our sturdy squad give up when Duke had the game in its pocket?

How else do you explain the Bruins, after giving up 57 points at halftime, rolling over and giving up 63 in the second half?

How else do you explain Duke's Ricky Price missing a shot, stripping the ball away, falling down, and making a pass from his knees, with the whole sequence ending in an uncontested three-pointer for Trajan Langdon?

How do you explain the four UCLA defenders who stood glued to the key the whole time, never moving to challenge the prostrate Price or

Guy Baker to lead national water polo team

COACH: Bruin gears up to prepare U.S. women's team for trip to Olympics

By Steve Kim
Daily Bruin Contributor

This weekend, UCLA women's and men's water polo head coach Guy Baker was selected to be the U.S. women's national team head coach by the governing body of U.S. Water Polo. U.S. Water Polo has yet to send out an official press release, thus Baker's status as head coach is unofficial but almost certain at this point.

Baker is also an assistant coach of the U.S. men's national team, but upon validation of his women's national team head coaching position, he will prioritize his time towards the women's team. He will start coaching for the national team after the end of the women's collegiate season this spring.

"The committee asked about my background, tactics, training schedule and dealing with players," said Baker, who was interviewed and notified of his position Saturday. "Our goal for the women's national team is to qualify for the Olympics at the 1999 FINA (Federation Internationale De Natation Amateur) Cup and place higher than our main competitors from Canada."

Baker's resume and job record was impressive enough to convince the committee to hire him as the women's national team head coach. Besides being an assistant coach of the men's national team at the 1992 Olympic games, Baker is the head coach of one of the most successful collegiate water polo programs in the nation. Both of his men's and women's collegiate squads were back-to-back national champions, and this year's women's team is having yet another great season with an undefeated streak.

Although Baker plans an intense training season for his national team, his primary focus now is on his colle-

Delta Lambda Phi returns to UCLA

DIVERSITY: Reactivated fraternity seeks student support, greater visibility

By Barbara Ortutay
Daily Bruin Contributor

Although the words "gay fraternity" may sound like an oxymoron, the organizers of Delta Lambda Phi are here to prove otherwise.

Delta Lambda Phi, UCLA's resurrected gay fraternity, was recognized by the office of fraternity and sorority relations on Friday.

The organizers of Delta Lambda Phi hope for widespread student support, as they begin rush next quarter.

"We have a lot of support from faculty and staff; all we need is students," said external co-president Ron Carranza.

The organizers of Delta Lambda Phi don't seem to believe the stereotype that fraternities tend to be homophobic.

"I honestly don't think that's true. There are people who are openly gay in many fraternities, though there may be those who are not out," said internal co-president Larry Lawrence.

When asked whether he would have joined another fraternity, Lawrence replied no.

Scott Carter, the fraternity's advisor, said he supports the students' effort and is looking forward to having Delta Lambda Phi back.

To become recognized by the university, a student group must go through a specific procedure, which includes having a constitution, at least three student members and accepting university procedures.

At first Delta Lambda Phi is looking to gain membership without having a house on fraternity row, which might take a few years.

Although they are not part of UCLA's inter-fraternity council, Delta Lambda Phi is a nationally recognized gay fraternity, with branches in UC Davis, Long Beach State and San Francisco State, among others.

In fact, Delta Lambda Phi was active in UCLA a few years ago. The national fraternity started around 1987, and a year later, UCLA became the first university in the nation to have a gay fraternity.

DONATION: 10 million contribution to benefit more undergraduates

By Marisa Yamane
Daily Bruin Contributor

All the glitz and glamour of Hollywood was present at UCLA's annual College of Letters and Science Awards dinner. This mini Academy Awards event was held on Monday night at the Regent Beverly Wilshire Hotel.

College of Letters and Science Provost Brian Copenhaver opened the program by announcing a landmark gift.

Universal Studios Chairman Emeritus Lew Wasserman and his wife, Edie, have donated a $10 million gift to Campaign UCLA, the campus-wide fund-raising effort first established in May 1997.

Most of the gift, $8.75 million, will go to the Edith and Lew Wasserman Fund for Undergraduate Support at UCLA, to provide scholarships for promising undergraduate students.

"This gift will help 100 students every year to get their education, forever," said Chancellor Albert Carnesale, about the largest gift ever designated for undergraduates.

"More students than you could ever count will benefit from the generosity of the Wassermans," he said.

The Wassermans have also presented the university with a $250,000 maintenance fund for the brand-new UCLA Palm Springs Center.

On top of that, the Wassermans have donated their estate in Palm Springs, valued at $700,000, for UCLA meetings, events, and conferences.

Another contribution of $300,000 will establish the Edith and Lew Wasserman Fund for The Geffen Playhouse, to subsidize the operating costs at the UCLA-owned theater.

"It's very necessary," said Lew Wasserman of UCLA's latest and most ambitious fund-raising endeavor, Campaign UCLA.

"I've thought 10 thousand times that it's a good idea. I decided to make my gift early."

Wasserman is an honorary co-chair of Campaign UCLA and a member of the campaign cabinet.

Actor John Lithgow, whose wife teaches in the history department at UCLA, was the master of ceremonies for the awards dinner.

"The evening was just so wonderful and inspiring last time that I was so delighted to be asked again," said Lithgow, who was the master of ceremonies two years ago.

The College of Letters and Science recognized and presented the Charles E. and Sue K. Young Undergraduate and Graduate

New system makes finance information more visible

FACULTY: Some fear plan will cut budget for small or emerging departments

By Michael Weiner
Daily Bruin Contributor

Responsibility Center Management (RCM), UCLA's new financial information system, has left some professors pleased and others concerned.

While some professors are optimistic about a budgetary system that appears to make the university's finances more visible to the faculty, others worry that RCM will cause smaller departments to lose money.

RCM, implemented over the past few years, is meant to make UCLA's financial situation more visible to deans, department chairs, and professors through quarterly financial reports and more planning, said George Letteney, the RCM project director.

"It provides a lot of visibility as to the sources and uses of funds," Letteney said. "It's a much more information-rich system than what previously existed."

Another dimension of RCM which has not yet been implemented university-wide, but has some professors worried, is a new budgetary distribution program. Schools and departments within UCLA will be given more money than before, but will be forced to pay for certain services which were previously free, like the library.

David Lefkowitz, an assistant professor of music, is worried that this aspect of RCM will be problematic for the university's smaller departments.

"Implicit, if not completely explicit in RCM, is that a department will earn revenue based on its number of students," Lefkowitz said.

"You realize that there are some real problems with this."

Lefkowitz said that RCM could be particularly harmful to UCLA's emerging departments. He said that if RCM was in place several years ago, programs such as computer science would not have had the opportunity to blossom.

"If RCM had been in place 20 or 30 years ago at most major research universities, as a nation, we would not be anywhere near where we are technologically," Lefkowitz said.

"There's a danger that RCM could stifle curricular creativity," he continued.

Lefkowitz worries that RCM will cause money to be distributed to departments based on the number of students enrolled. He is also concerned that it will hurt the music department because of its small classes and one-on-one instruction.

"A revenue system whereby departments would be paid according

Town-hall meeting gives students a voice

Representatives from the transportation department, housing department, the College of Letters and Science and the assistant vice chancellor to the Capitol Program spoke at a town hall meeting Tuesday. Held at Ackerman Union, the meeting gave students an opportunity to voice concerns and questions to administrative representatives "involved in the issues," said Internal Vice-President (IVP) Carol Lee.

Comments and questions made during the meeting stressed the importance of increased communication between the administration and students, construction on campus and increased transportation.

"We were excited that a good amount of students came not associated with the IVP. It shows that there are a lot of students out there concerned about these issues as well," said Liz Geyer of the IVP office.

UC schools acquire most patent dollars

The UC system has earned more money from its patents and licenses than any other university, according to a study.

The nine UC campuses earned $63.2 million in patents, placing them first among the 173 major colleges and universities surveyed by the Connecticut-based Association of University Technology Managers.

Stanford University placed second in the survey with $43.8 million, followed by Columbia University with $40.6 million earned in license and patent money.

Biotechnology and medical-related patents made up the majority of the top 25 UC system patents. UC San Francisco's hepatitis-B vaccine ranked first, with a $26 million profit last year. Other UC inventions include the process of splicing genes, the nicotine patch, the human growth gene and the atomic force microscope.

The survey also found an increasing trend in the revenue raised by patents and licenses over the past five years at universities focusing on research.

But David Hodges, a Berkeley professor of electrical engineering and computer science, said that in the computer field, changes are so rapid that patents do not yield a substantial source of income.

Instead, patents that have been around for a long time are the actual money-makers.

"Computers change so fast, so success is not based on patents," Hodges said.

"Patents are not so important in my field. However, in medicine and drugs, patents are good for 20 years or so," he added.

Too timid to tatto

For a less painful, less risky body art, many are flocking to beauty salons and tattoo and piercing parlors to experience mehndi, the all-natural skin decoration

AELIA KHAN

Pascal Giacomini draws patterns with mehndi on a customer's hand.

By Meghan Ward
Daily Bruin Contributor

When Corine Leseuer, a conservative woman in her 50s, greeted her husband at the door, she held out her arm to show him her new red heart-shaped tattoo with his name written across it. Charles Leseuer thought his wife had gone mad. Midlife crisis? No, mehndi.

mehndi, the Haitian word for henna tattoo, is the latest trend in body decoration. Painless, sanitary and inexpensive, mehndi provides an alternative to those who are having trouble deciding if that fire-breathing dragon tattoo will look as cool at 80 as it does at 20.

AELIA KHAN

A closer view of some of the designs that can be drawn.

Though henna has long been used in Western culture as natural hair dye, it has only recently become prevalent in hair salons and tattoo and piercing parlors as coloring used to create temporary tattoos on the skin.

The henna plant (lawsonia inermis) is a small shrub grown in the dry, hot climates of Northern Africa and Southeast Asia. The strongest natural dye in the world, henna leaves and twigs are ground into a fine powder and sifted through nylon to remove unwanted debris.

The powder is then mixed with oils to form a paste, and the paste is applied to the skin in designs ranging from traditional Indian patterns and African designs to Japanese floral decorations and art nouveau motifs.

The paste is kept moist for one half hour by dabbing it with a lemon/sugar solution. The hardened henna is left on for 6 to 20 hours and then removed with a cotton ball and vegetable oil or scraped off with the dull edge of a knife.

Once the paste is removed, the stain on the skin may range from a light orange to a dark brown or even burgundy color. The design will typically remain two to four weeks, depending on the quality of the henna and how often one washes one's skin.

Carin Fabius and Pascal Giacomini, owners of Gallery Lakaye in Los Angeles, opened the first all-mehndi parlor in the United States last year.

"When we first opened, we were getting as many calls for people wanting to do mehndi as people who wanted to get it done," Fabius recalls.

At the time, articles about mehndi were running in People, Vanity Fair and Los Angeles magazine. Celebrities like Naomi Campbell, Demi Moore and Mira Sorvino were having mehndi applied.

Soon hair salons and tattoo parlors began offering mehndi to customers. Realizing how little information about mehndi was available to the general public, Fabius and Giacomini decided to focus their efforts on trade shows, trainings and mehndi supplies.

Frustrated with the fact that once henna is mixed into a paste it only lasts three days, Fabius and Giacomini hired a chemist to combine henna with a natural preservative in order to create a natural henna mixture with a shelf-life.

Seven months later, they marketed the Lakaye Mehndi Studio Earth Henna body painting kit. The kit is complete with everything one needs to practice mehndi and once prepared, the paste lasts up to six weeks.

In addition, with the Lakaye kit, the wet paste remains on the skin for just six hours instead of the typical 15 to 20 hours that other kits require.

Corinne Weber, second-year world arts and cultures major at UCLA, got a mehndi armband at the Farmer's Market in Westwood last quarter. Weber agrees that the hardest part is waiting for the paste to dry. "It was on for about a day. I couldn't put my arm to my body. That part was kind of annoying," Weber says.

Other mehndi artists offer color and black mehndi. Color tattoos last only three days, but are convenient for those who want to test out what a real tattoo would look like and for those like Leseuer, whose motivation is shock value.

Ravenna Bennet, a third-year student at UCLA, is a mehndi artist at Thirteen BC, a piercing/mehndi parlor on Melrose Avenue, where black mehndi is especially popular. "Right now, the black is more popular because it shows up better and looks more like a real tattoo," Bennett says.

Parlors that practice black mehndi use natural henna mixed with a chemical, or a chemical by itself. Bennett confirms that at Thirteen BC, black mehndi is performed using an Asian chemical dye called kattam.

Marsha Knight, web site designer and part-time mehndi artist at Angel Hair Salon on 3rd Street in Los Angeles warns her customers about black mehndi.

"One girl who came here – her friend had it done and she said it turned green and splotchy. It also dyes the hair on your arms. One other guy had it done and it scarred his skin. It looked like a chemical burn."

Bennett agrees that kattam does sometimes cause skin irritations. However, she is aware of only three customers that have had allergic reactions to black mehndi.

"The people who did have a reaction had the black henna done and when it faded, came back and had it

Menhdi can also be done on the feet. New forms of henna paste take less time to dry.

U.S. math scores rank low among international testing results

EDUCATION: Government concerned over students' inadequate performance

By Robert Greene
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON – President Clinton decried high school seniors' poor performance on an international math and science test as a larger failure by the generation of adults responsible for educating them. "There is no excuse for this," he said.

In a speech before the National Council of Jewish Woman, Clinton said America's showing among the lowest of 21 nations on the Third International Mathematics and Science Study is "a leading indicator" of the real problems with public education, and Congress must act quickly to correct them.

"I am hoping and praying that we can put aside partisan politics when it comes to education," Clinton said. "It is so important to our future."

Clinton rejected arguments that some students did not perform well because they come from poor families or are troubled by social problems. He said the "sophisticated conversations" about water quality that he had with inner-city kids during a recent visit to a Baltimore marine life program proved that it is not true.

"But it is true that too many people are not learning," Clinton said. "There is something wrong with the system, and it is our generation's responsibility to fix it. You cannot blame the schoolchildren. There is no excuse for this."

Education Secretary Richard Riley also decried the test results, which showed that even top high school seniors taking the toughest math and science courses performed far worse than similar students in most other countries.

"This is unacceptable," Riley said.

Not only did typical American seniors do poorly, but those who took physics and advanced math courses such as calculus and analytical geometry also performed at or near the bottom when compared with students in other countries who took similar courses.

"Our best students in mathematics and science are simply not 'world class,'" said William H. Schmidt, a Michigan State University professor and national research coordinator for the federally supported project. "Even the very small percentage of students taking Advanced Placement courses are not among the world's best."

Riley and others blamed a dearth of qualified teachers and easy graduation requirements. About half of physics teachers lack a major or minor in that subject. Likewise, about half of college-bound seniors have not taken four years of science.

Others, like Schmidt, said that students in other countries begin learning elements of algebra, geometry, physics and chemistry in middle school, while science and math teaching in this country is often repetitive and not challenging. Previously reported results for fourth- and eighth-graders found the relative U.S. performance was stronger in those grades.

Teaching here usually is done layer-cake fashion, devoted to one subject per year, while the curricu-

Citizens able to sue against sale of cigarettes to minors

LAWSUIT: State court rules private plaintiffs can challenge retailers

The Associated Press

SAN FRANCISCO – An Oakland attorney who has filed hundreds of lawsuits against Northern California retailers for selling cigarettes to minors now has the support of the state Supreme Court.

The court said California's broad unfair-competition law allows private citizens to challenge illegal business practices.

In a 6-1 ruling Monday, the court rejected arguments by Lucky Stores – backed by business groups and Attorney General Dan Lungren – that only state and local prosecutors could act against retailers who broke a criminal law such as the ban on cigarette sales to minors.

Lucky Stores was sued by Oakland attorney Donald Driscoll on behalf of a group called Stop Youth Addiction, which is headed by Driscoll's mother. The group sent 16-year-olds into Lucky supermarkets from Sacramento to San Jose, and most were able to buy cigarettes despite a state law forbidding sales to those under 18, Driscoll said.

Driscoll said Monday's ruling was a victory for the public.

"We've got a very serious act of wrongdoing, selling cigarettes to children who become addicted. Is it possible for a private plaintiff to do something about it, or do we have to wait and hope that government will get around to solving the problem?" he said.

The suit seeks $10 billion in restitution to the state, the profits Lucky allegedly made by selling cigarettes to minors or to adults who were addicted as minors. The court didn't say whether payments could be ordered if the suit succeeded. Justice Marvin Baxter, in a separate opinion, said restitution would be proper only to business competitors or to minors who bought cigarettes.

Many of Driscoll's previous lawsuits were settled with a $100 payment to the organization or to charity and an agreement not to sell to minors. Some targets called the suits extortion.

Gail Lees, a lawyer for Lucky Stores, said the company has a "very aggressive policy that's very strictly enforced, forbidding sales to minors," and expects to win the case. But she said the ruling was bad for California businesses.

Under the ruling, she said, "corporations who do business with consumers can be subject to repetitive

Improved jury conditions needed

COURTS: Chief justice wants better conditions for citizens serving duty

By Steve Lawrence
The Associated Press

SACRAMENTO – Chief Justice Ronald George's cold, hard encounter with a courthouse floor in Beverly Hills and his tour of California courts taught him a lesson: jury duty can be no fun.

"The pervasive message too often is that we neither respect the contributions of jurors, nor value their time," George told legislators Monday in his annual "State of the Judiciary" address.

George said jurors' pay is inadequate and jury rooms are often small and sometimes dirty, and responding to a jury service summons can mean long hours of boredom and uncertainty.

"There are very few individuals who would willingly spend day after day in a molded plastic seat under fluorescent lights with no place to relax, receiving scant information about what is expected of them or why they must wait," he said.

"Nor do those subjected to such conditions leave with a sense of a judicial system that is attentive to the public's needs."

George said he experienced the shortcomings of jury duty firsthand when he was summoned to serve as a juror last June in Municipal Court in Beverly Hills.

He said he and other jurors had to sit on the floor for about 10 minutes while waiting for the jury assembly room to open.

He also said that he's seen jurors sitting on stairs because there was no other place to wait to be called to a courtroom.

The chief justice recommended several steps to improve conditions for jurors and increase the number of people who willingly respond to a jury duty summons.

> "Our courthouses must be bastions that protect public safety in every sense."
> Ronald George
> Chief Justice

In one county that response rate dropped to six percent, a situation George said created "disturbing ramifications for our concept of participatory democracy."

Among other things, he suggested:

·Boosting juror pay from the "measly statutory (requirement of) $5 per day – a low among the states – to a more meaningful figure," and providing other benefits for jurors, such as day care or free rides to the courthouse on public transportation.

·Making waiting for selection to a jury a one-day affair. If a juror isn't picked for a trial the first day, he or she is excused from jury duty for the rest of the year. Serving on one trial jury would also excuse a juror from serving the rest of the year.

·Simplifying judges' instructions to jurors to make them easier to understand.

·Providing additional courthouse interpreters to deal with the more than 200 languages spoken in California.

·Upgrading courthouse data systems to improve communications with other agencies and the public.

·Allocating an unspecified amount of money to improve, and in some cases replace, inadequate courthouse facilities and boost courtroom security.

"In some counties there are not enough bailiffs to protect every courtroom," he said. "This is a particular problem in family law courts, where the greatest incidence of in-court violence has occurred over the past several years."

He said he saw law books stacked to create a protective barrier in a court where gunman took a hostage a few years before.

"Security is a significant issue up and down the state," he said.

U.N. may avert strike against Iraq

WAR: Security Council studies accord allowing access to weapons sites

By Susan Sevareid
The Associated Press

UNITED NATIONS – Secretary-General Kofi Annan briefed the Security Council on Tuesday on his weapons inspection agreement with Iraq, emerging with "a general sense of approval" although some details remain to be worked out.

U.S. Ambassador Bill Richardson agreed, saying: "We believe that this agreement is a step in the right direction, but we need some clarifications in some of the language."

The council did not immediately make a decision on the accord struck by Annan in a visit to Baghdad – an agreement he called "a victory for the United Nations."

"I am pleased to tell you that I had a general sense of approval from the membership as to the agreement that I signed in Baghdad," Annan said. "Obviously, there are details that have to be worked out."

Richardson said it could take a few days to get the clarifications the United States is looking for. Some concerns he cited were that the U.N. Special Commission, which oversees inspections, maintain a pre-eminent role, and that a clause in the accord acknowledging respect for Iraqi sovereignty not be used as an excuse to avoid its obligations.

British Ambassador John Weston said his government also was seeking some clarifications, but would not elaborate.

Richardson would not say when he expected inspectors to visit the presidential sites. The United States, distrustful of Iraqi President Saddam Hussein, said it wants to ensure that there are no loopholes in the deal that Saddam may use to his advantage.

Annan, however, said this agreement is different from others.

"We have to remember that in the years that the U.N. has been present in Baghdad, many agreements have been signed, but ... this one was negotiated with the president himself. And the leadership has got the message that he wants cooperation, he wants it done."

The secretary-general had been upbeat this morning going into the closed Security Council meeting. Legally, the accord does not require Security Council approval; but politically it would be difficult to proceed without it.

"We have a good agreement, an

Attorney general attempts to rid federal agencies of corruption

MEXICO: Government must enact tougher laws to solve police problems

By John Rice
The Associated Press

MEXICO CITY – Saying Mexico's police are "living with the enemy," federal Attorney General Jorge Madrazo Cuellar is urging tougher laws to eliminate corruption from police forces, newspapers here reported Tuesday.

"It is practically impossible to fire a police employee due to the protection offered by the law," Madrazo said during an appearance Monday in the northern city of Monterrey.

Madrazo's agency prosecutes federal crimes and also operates Mexico's main anti-narcotics force, the Federal Judicial Police, which has been plagued for years by corruption.

Madrazo said that of 800 Federal Judicial Police agents fired in 1996, more than 400 had been rehired – with back pay – because of legal requirements, according to the government's Notimex news agency.

He said Mexico's constitution should be changed to make such cleanup efforts easier.

Officials have long admitted that drug traffickers and other criminals have bought off many policemen and there have been repeated, widely publicized campaigns to fire corrupt agents. Still, corruption continues.

"Why, many times, can we not catch criminal gangs or those of organized crime? The answer is that they are encrusted in our agencies," Madrazo was quoted as saying by the daily Excelsior.

"It is like living with the enemy. We have the enemy in the house; we have it outside and we have it inside. So it is absolutely indispensable that we can purify our police agencies," said Madrazo, according to the Monterrey daily El Norte.

In the latest large-scale cleanup effort, Madrazo said that only about

Drop in energy prices eliminates inflation

ECONOMY: Solid growth, low unemployment gives consumers confidence

By Dave Skidmore
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON – The biggest drop in energy prices in nearly seven years wiped out U.S. inflation in January.

Consumer prices overall were unchanged, marking the first month without an increase since January 1994, the Labor Department said today.

"Inflation remains utterly absent," said economist Bruce Steinberg of Merrill Lynch.

A New York-based business research group said consumer confidence soared to a three-decade high in February, thanks to American satisfaction with low unemployment and strong growth. The Conference Board's index reached the highest level since October 1968.

Today's inflation report underscores analysts' belief that Federal Reserve policy-makers aren't likely to increase interest rates because there's little prospect of an inflation breakout.

Fed Chairman Alan Greenspan, delivering his twice-a-year report to Congress, indicated the central bank was content to leave interest rates unchanged while it waited to see how "storm clouds" from Asia affected the U.S. economy.

"The key question going forward is whether the restraint building from the turmoil in Asia will be sufficient to check inflationary tendencies that might otherwise result from the strength to domestic spending and tightening labor markets," Greenspan said.

Markets expected both the good inflation news and Greenspan's remarks, so they showed little reaction to them. But by late morning, the Dow Jones average of industrial stocks slipped 40 points to 8,370, in part because two giant drug companies – Glaxo Wellcome and SmithKline Beecham – called off their merger.

The Labor Department said energy costs plunged 2.4 percent, the largest decrease since March 1991. They're 25 percent lower than a year ago and, with crude oil prices still falling, they'll probably decline further.

Food prices rose a moderate 0.3 percent last month, pushed up by a 7.9 percent increase in fresh vegetables, including a 33 percent jump in lettuce.

Excluding the volatile food and energy categories, prices climbed a modest 0.2 percent.

Inflation last year was just 1.7 percent, the mildest rate since the Guerrero police probe five political killings

ACAPULCO, Mexico – Five murders in two days are being blamed on political struggles in the pacific coast state of Guerrero – with pro- and anti-government activists dead.

The state attorney general's office announced Monday that it is probing the shooting of four men during a wedding in Tepetixtla, a mountain village roughly 30 miles northwest of Acapulco.

Two of the victims of Sunday's shooting were prominent local members of the governing Institutional Revolutionary Party in a town suspected by officials of being a hotbed of pro-guerrilla activity.

Deputy attorney general Joel Ortiz Hernandez told Notimex that his probe has been complicated because witnesses have refused to testify for fear of reprisals.

Meanwhile, a Democratic Revolution activist was shot to death in the state capital of Chilpancingo.

Wildfire smoke closes airport

JAKARTA, Indonesia – Wildfires have charred 34,600 acres of drought-affected forest on the Indonesian section of Borneo island, covering parts with thick smoke Monday.

The haze forced Samarinda's Temindung airport, 745 miles northeast of Jakarta, to close for about seven hours Monday because of poor visibility.

The airport has been closed 16 times since fires were first reported in the area in January.

East Kalimantan provincial Gov. H.M. Ardans blamed the fires mainly on logging and plantation operators wanting to clear land cheaply, the official Antara news agency reported.

In 1997, Indonesia wildfires caused respiratory illness, disrupting air travel and hurting tourism.

LAUSD to provide guns for police

LOS ANGELES – The nation's second-largest school district will arm its police with shotguns under a controversial plan approved by the Board of Education.

The Los Angeles Unified School District board voted 5-2 to buy the shotguns after police said they are in increasing danger because their patrols often take them into gang- and crime-ridden neighborhoods around campuses.

About two dozen officers applauded Monday's vote.

The district will buy 75 of the 12-gauge Remington shotguns, which will be provided to the police force in about 60 days. The shotguns will be locked in patrol cars while officers make their foot patrols. Officers assigned to handle the weapons will receive 16 hours of training.

The vote followed a contentious hearing during which some board members argued that greater police firepower would protect students while others said they feared accidental shootings resulting from the police having weapons.

"If it would help one student or one parent, it's worth 100 shotguns," board member Barbara Boudreaux said. "If we think we live in a safe city, where officers don't need guns, then we're living in an unreality."

However, board member Valerie Fields, who voted with board president Julie Korenstein against the measure, said the weapons were unnecessary.

"If crime is down in the state, the county and the school district, why do we need to ratchet up firepower?" she said.

"If anybody is harmed or killed, this Board of Education will be liable," Korenstein said. "Our officers need to be role models, not in the position of taking someone out."

Catastrophe capital engulfed by mudslides

FLOODS: Overflowing Laguna Canyon highway, mud buries cars, kills one

By Larry Gerber
The Associated Press

LAGUNA BEACH, Calif. – Paul Wade spent a night at the office as mudslides thundered down on two sides. Eliseo Jaimes was home with his three kids, trying to keep their spirits up by acting brave as scary sounds raged around the cottage.

"Actually, I was scared myself," Jaimes said Tuesday, surveying the muddy aftermath on Laguna Canyon Road.

People who live in one of Southern California's catastrophe capitals took the latest one in short, sucking strides. Neighbors helped each other unearth buried cars. Some used shovels to cut runoff channels through mucky driveways and front yards.

One person was killed. At daybreak, rescue workers found the body of Glenn Flook, 25, covered with mud outside a home where he was staying because his own house was damaged. Ten people were hospitalized with mostly minor injuries.

In 1993, a wildfire damaged or destroyed 366 homes and charred nearly 14,000 acres of sage scrub on the hillsides that surround this tourist center and art colony. The fire left Laguna vulnerable to mudslides, particularly north along Highway 133, the only artery inland.

On Tuesday, the highway looked like a muddy stream. The night before, it flowed hip-high, said Jaimes.

"The ground was shaking. It felt like an earthquake," said Wade, who was stranded by mud at Victoria's Skimboards, the surf shop where he works. "The canyon's been flooded before but it's never been this bad."

"There were boulders coming down as big as this crate," said John Miller, holding up a plastic milk crate that he had just fished out of the mud in the middle of the highway. Nearby, a truck driver stuck a stray surfboard nose-down in the mud for the owner to find.

Residents and shop owners slogged upstream in Tuesday's sunshine to check out damage, sometimes sinking calf-high as they dodged beeping trucks and loaders. Cars and pickups were buried bumper-deep in mud.

Less than a mile away, where seasonally wet or dry Laguna Canyon drains into the sea, downtown merchants got a milder dose.

"It's something to see. You wish you had a canoe sometimes," Ken Seward said as he sluiced off the sidewalk with a garden hose in front of a friend's shop.

A flood in early December actually brought more water, he said. But the latest one caught Seward somewhat off guard.

He makes flood barriers for downtown merchants and had fallen behind on his orders, so he was hurrying Monday evening to sandbag a client's doorway.

"Suddenly the waves started lapping up between my legs," he said. "When it peaks, it really peaks fast."

Crane Cast said he had videotaped so many Laguna disasters that he didn't get out his camera this time. He joined dozens of others at tiny Main Beach watching crews shore up the boardwalk, which collapsed in a previous storm.

"We survived the last couple of years," said Jaimes. "A big fire, now the rain and now we are ready for what? An earthquake?

"Let's hope not."

Eighth inmate found dead at Pelican Bay State Prison

DEATHS: Prosecutor says officials failed to offer protection from gangs

The Associated Press

SACRAMENTO – An eighth inmate was found dead this week at the high-security Pelican Bay State Prison, soon after a prosecutor accused officials of failing to protect an inmate who has implicated prison gang members in the deaths.

Del Norte County Deputy District Attorney James Fallman asked for a federal investigation into the way the Department of Corrections has handled the killings over the past two years, according to a Feb. 13 brief filed in Superior Court.

On Monday, inmate Timothy Waldron, 25, was found strangled in his high-security cell and his cellmate, who allegedly has ties to the Aryan Brotherhood (AB), was named as the primary suspect, officials said.

In a friend of the court brief, Fallman suggested that inmate witness Matthew Joseph Monaco exposed the prison system's "inability to stop the AB's reign of terror." He added that prison officials are responding "in whatever way makes the least waves – even if promises of protection are not kept to inmate witnesses." Fallman filed the brief in support of Monaco's efforts to transfer out of Pelican Bay.

Monaco testified last year in the trial of Aryan Brotherhood member Brian Healy, who was convicted of manslaughter in the strangulation murder of Arthur Ruffo, his cellmate and fellow prison gang member. Healy has since agreed to cooperate in the gang investigation.

Corrections spokesman Tip Kindel said Fallman's statements in the Monaco case brief "came out of the blue." Department officials dispatched a team of investigators Monday to Del Norte County to interview Fallman about his charges, he said.

"We've not seen anything like this," Kindel said. "It's very serious and we're treating it very seriously."

Monday's homicide is the eighth in the secured housing unit.

FBI spokesman George Grotz in San Francisco said his agency has been "made aware" of Fallman's accusations and "we're taking a look" at them.

Monday's homicide is the eighth in the secured housing unit of Pelican Bay since Feb. 1996, when Healy strangled Ruffo. Six of the killings are believed to be linked to an internal Aryan Brotherhood struggle between the 50 or so members of the prison gang who are housed in the unit, officials said.

South Korean president wants end to cold war

POLITICS: Kim Dae-jung warms to idea of opening dialogue with the North

By Nicholas D. Kristof
The New York Times

SEOUL, South Korea – Kim Dae-jung, one of Asia's most vigorous voices for democracy and political tolerance, was inaugurated as South Korea's president Wednesday morning and immediately called for reconciliation and cooperation with North Korea.

Standing on the steps of the National Assembly and addressing a vast throng of supporters, Kim called for far-reaching changes in South Korea's economy, political structure and even education system as essential to pull the nation out of its financial crisis. But it was his message to North Korea that may have the greatest long-term impact, for Kim proposed an exchange of special envoys, a possible summit meeting, and various family reunions and private exchanges between the two Koreas.

"I earnestly appeal to the North Korean authorities," Kim declared as he stood at the podium under the crisp winter sun. "Many members of separated families have grown old and are passing away. We must let those separated from their families in the South and the North meet and communicate with each other as soon as possible."

It is not clear how North Korea will respond, and almost no one expects an immediate breakthrough. But North Korea has made some conciliatory suggestions in recent weeks, and Kim went out of his way Tuesday to "take note of some positive signs North Korea has shown of late."

"We will actively pursue reconciliation and cooperation."

Kim Dae-jung
President of South Korea

The two Koreas, bitter enemies since they fought in the Korean War, are now virtually as isolated from each other as if they were on different planets. Although neighbors geographically, there is no mail service between the two, no telephone service, no diplomatic relations, and in each country it is against the law to praise the other or even to listen to the other's radio broadcasts.

Kim's tone in his inaugural address suggested that he is genuinely seeking to break down some of these barriers, and not just to score points. In contrast to the harsh approach of his predecessor, Kim Young-sam, whose mother was shot to death in 1960 by North Korean infiltrators who broke into the family home looking for money, Kim Dae-jung avoided recriminations and emphasized that the South has no intention of absorbing the North.

The spectacle of Kim Dae-jung, 74, a lifelong dissident, limping across the stage to take his oath of office as president – he still suffers from a bad hip because of the military government's apparent attempt to assassinate him in a car crash in 1971 – was rich with historical resonance and irony. Just 11 years ago, Kim's name could not be mentioned in the Korean press, and government bureaucrats virtually spat with contempt when his name was mentioned; now those same bureaucrats are working for him. And, in some cases, they voted for him.

Even in the last few years, the national intelligence agency has been presumed by virtually everyone to have been tapping Kim's telephones, and government offices went out of their way to hurt his image at home and abroad. Indeed, Kim in the last few days switched his choice for protocol chief, apparently because the man he had wanted was a career diplomat who came under suspicion of having worked in earlier years to quash Kim's nomination for a Nobel Peace Prize.

Kim's background as a dissident who was frequently accused of being a North Korean sympathizer or spy gives him a bit of extra credibility in North Korea. In his speech Tuesday, Kim tried to build on that credibility by declaring three principles regarding North Korea.

First, he said, in a clear warning not to mistake courtesy for weakness, "we will never tolerate armed provocation of any kind."

Second, he sought to reassure the North that the South's policy is not threatening, saying "we do not have any intention to undermine or absorb North Korea."

Third, he added, "we will actively pursue reconciliation and cooperation between the South and the North.

"The Cold War-style South-North relations that have not allowed members of separated families for over half a century to ascertain even whether their own parents and brothers and sisters were alive or dead, let alone carry on dialogues and exchanges, must end as soon as possible," Kim said. "I cannot but feel boundless shame before our ancestors who maintained one unified country for more than 1,300 years."

To be sure, the border between North and South Korea is littered with nearly as many abortive dialogues as land mines, and hopes tend to be followed by disappointments nearly as surely as sunset after sunrise. Particularly in 1972 and again in 1991, both sides held important discussions to ease tensions, and in 1994 there would have been a summit meeting between the two if North Korean President Kim Il Sung had not suffered a fatal heart attack while inspecting the planned site of the meetings.

The upshot is that nearly a decade after the Cold War ended in most of the world, it remains alive and healthy here. Recent accounts suggest that in 1994 the United States and South Korea came much closer than most people realized to a war that could have resulted in hundreds of thousands of casualties.

That bleak history makes many diplomats and scholars skeptical of the chances of any sudden warming but also eager for any steps, however gradual, to reduce the tensions in a border area that President Clinton described during a 1993 visit as "the scariest place on Earth."

In one potentially important step, Kim suggested that he might not object if North Korea pushed to improve ties with the United States and Japan. In the past, Seoul has objected vigorously to any prospect of improved relations between its allies and North Korea, but if the South drops its objections that might lead eventually to diplomatic ties between the United States and North Korea.

"That is the most important signal that Kim Dae-jung could send to North Korea at this time," said Selig S. Harrison, director of a project on Korea for the Twentieth Century Fund Foundation in Washington.

AWARDS

Student Awards to eight exceptional students, and the Faculty Award to a professor in the Department of Chemistry and Biochemistry.

The 1998 recipients of the Charles E. and Sue K. Young Graduate Student Awards, which included a $2,000 prize, are Christopher Campbell (sociology), Alison Hamilton (anthropology), Beth Lorenzo (musicology), and Amber Puha (mathematics). The award winners are all outstanding students in their respective departments.

"This award symbolizes the values of the UCLA community and to receive this is a tremendous honor," Campbell said.

"It's special because it combines academics, teaching, and commitment to the UCLA community," he said.

The 1998 Charles E. and Sue K. Young Undergraduate Student Awards went to Roberto Alvarez (English), Elizabeth Lamers (musicology), Michelle Toy (business economics), and Marina Dorian (psychology and Russian).

"Receiving this award is a special honor for me because I didn't apply for it," said Toy, who plans a career as an entrepreneur.

"I was nominated by the economics department, and I didn't find out 'til they told me I had won," she said.

"Experience everything that UCLA has to offer, whether it's academics or community service. Enjoy your years beyond the books," she advised her peers.

The Faculty Award of $5,000 was presented to Charles M. Knobler, a professor and department chair of chemistry and biochemistry. He is internationally renowned as one of the world's experts in the science of chemicals in their liquid state.

Finally, the College presented Dr. Mitchell D. Covel and his wife, Susan, with the evening's highest accolade, the Honorary Fellow Award. The Covels received a standing ovation for their 24-year involvement in fund raising.

"The Covels opened their home and hearts, and have given generously of their time. It's out of their love for UCLA," Chancellor Carnesale remarked.

The Covels were overwhelmed by all the accolades they have been receiving.

"When we donated, we never expected all the attention," Sue Covel said.

Late last year, Sunset Commons was renamed Covel Commons in their honor.

to the number of students enrolled in the courses would be devastating to fine arts, and music in particular," he said.

"It's argued that a department can support one-on-one instruction by shifting their economic priorities in that direction, but for a department like music, it is unclear where those priorities would be 'shifted from,' Lefkowitz added.

But, other professors do not think Lefkowitz's concerns apply to the version of RCM that has been adopted by UCLA, which differs from the type of RCM in place at other universities.

"The idea of equating budgets with numbers of students was rejected for this campus," said anthropology professor Dwight Read, who chaired a faculty committee last year which explored RCM. Read's committee reported that they were "cautiously optimistic" about RCM in January 1997.

English department chair Thomas Wortham said that the type of RCM which Lefkowitz worried about was not adopted.

"What was very clear early on was that an RCM that would drive the budget was undesirable," Wortham said. "What was good about RCM was to have a budget that was more visible."

Chancellor Albert Carnesale said that policy decisions will never be based on financial data only.

"There were some people concerned that policy decisions might be based solely on the financial data, but that's easily reduced to absurdity," he said.

According to Carnesale, if RCM were to lead to that, "first I'd just close down the library. They don't make any money. Then the humanities. Get rid of them."

CIGARETTES

lawsuits by self-appointed public advocates where there's none of the screening that occurs with public prosecutors."

The 1993 unfair-competition law allows private individuals and groups to sue for injuries suffered by themselves or the general public, caused by business practices that were unfair, fraudulent or illegal. Such suits can seek restitution of profits from the practices, an injunction against future acts, and attorney's fees.

Lucky also argued that the suit should be dismissed because Driscoll used minors to make illegal purchases. Justice Janice Rogers Brown supported that argument in her dissenting opinion, saying that "the avenger may be guilty of the greater crime."

The court said it wasn't condoning law-breaking, only deciding that a private citizen could sue. Driscoll said the question was beside the point.

"It's obvious that there's a need to allow people to find out if the law's being broken," Driscoll said.

JURORS

"Some courts have no metal detectors. In others, equipment is standing idle because there are no funds to operate it.

"Our courthouses must be bastions that protect public safety in every sense, not locations where people are at physical risk of harm."

The chief justice also said he is concerned about the increasing use of private judges, hired by businesses to settle civil disputes.

George said he would appoint a task force to study whether "private judging" should be regulated.

"Some fear the perception of a two-track system of justice, where those who can afford it will pick the private judge of their choice and obtain a fast-track resolution of their dispute," he said. "This would relegate to our public courts those persons unable to afford private judges and those defendants and victims involved with criminal offenses," he said.

SCORES

lum elsewhere blends disciplines, he says.

Some American high schoolers agreed that their preparation could be better.

"It could have been better if in middle school or in elementary school I got the training I was supposed to be getting," said Kamille Brown, 17, a senior in Miami. "It's important to start with the youth and have them get the training that they're supposed to be getting at the elementary and middle-school level so that they can be better established."

Brown, visiting Washington, says she needs now to focus on what she does well, which is writing and analysis. So she's taking American government, economics, honors English, television production and other subjects, but no physics.

Kristin Schulte, a visiting 16-year-old junior from Wichita, Kan., said that she had switched from a Catholic school to a public school in the ninth grade, and repeated much of what she had learned in the eighth.

"Biology is like a basic review of seventh- or eighth-grade stuff," she said. "I should have gone to something harder."

She plans to take physics as a senior after her PSAT scores showed the price for not taking chemistry or physics.

The international tests, given in the 1994-1995 school year, measured general math and science knowledge, defined as the knowledge needed "to function effectively in society."

In general math knowledge, the U.S. students were below the international average and closest in performance to students in the Czech Republic, Italy, Lithuania and the Russian Federation. Americans scored significantly lower than students in 14 other countries, mostly European, but including Australia and Canada. Asian countries did not take part in the 12th-grade study.

In general science, U.S. students also scored below the international average alongside the Czech Republic, France, Germany, Hungary, Italy, Lithuania and the Russian Federation. Eleven countries scored significantly higher.

Only 42 percent of U.S. students could answer why spike heels might cause more damage to floors than might ordinary heels. Sixty percent of international students knew the answer that more energy is concentrated in a smaller area.

American students who took advanced mathematics scored far below the international average, along with students from Austria, the Czech Republic, Germany and Italy. Eleven countries, including the Russian Federation, did much better.

In physics, the United States ranked at the bottom with Austria. Fourteen other countries had scores that were significantly higher.

FRATERNITY

However, a few years later, in 1992, it became inactive. According to Carter, there was no one reason why; it may have simply been a decline in membership due to students graduating.

The reason for restarting the defunct fraternity at UCLA was to "get a group together to support all the events going on in UCLA's gay community, which seems to be somewhat fractured," Lawrence said.

"I hope that by organizing this fraternity, we will make the gay community more visible, and people who are questioning their sexuality will see that it's not that hard to be gay on campus," said Ryan Thomson, a second-year biology student.

Any male student can join Delta Lambda Phi. They do not have to be gay, providing they show support for the gay community, said Carter.

"A lot of what UCLA stands for is promoting diversity. Hopefully we'll do that," said Lawrence.

The purpose of a fraternity, among others, is to provide service to the community. Delta Lambda Phi has already been active in serving the gay community this quarter.

On "Tie the Knot Week," in the second week of February, they distributed flyers and ribbons to UCLA students in support of gay marriages.

"In general UCLA students tend to be very responsive (to the gay community), in a good way," Carranza said.

"People have been becoming very accepting of the gay identity," Lawrence added.

There is widespread interest in UCLA's lesbian community for a sorority, although there have not been any concrete steps towards organizing one.

"I know there is definitely interest. Just imagine the possibilities," said Stevi Benton, a first-year engineering student.

MENDHI

done again in the same spot," Bennett adds. She advises that anyone concerned about having a reaction do a test patch 48 hours prior to receiving a mehndi design.

The art of mehndi (also spelled mendhi or mehandi) originated in Egypt over three thousand years ago. Traces of henna have been found on the fingertips and toes of mummified Pharaohs.

Spreading through Northern Africa and the Middle East, mehndi made its way to India during the 12th century where it was valued in particularly hot and dry regions for its cooling properties. Indians cooled their bodies by applying henna paste to their hands and their feet.

Gradually, people began to use henna as a cosmetic, as Indians created designs on their skin for special ceremonies such as weddings and the Hindu new year celebration, Devali. It was custom for a bride-to-be to gather with other females the night before her wedding so she could be painted with henna, while the others divulged the secrets of married life.

Sometimes the bridegroom's name would be hidden in a design on the woman's body. The following night, he would have to find his name on the woman's body before the marriage could be consummated.

You do not need to be a bride to get mehndi. You do not even need to wait until summer (although summer is the most popular time to get mehndi because people like to show it off). There are mehndi artists all over Los Angeles eager to paint your hands, your feet, your navel, what-have-you.

Men generally prefer tribal armbands while women go for the vine bracelets.

For the artistically inclined, kits are sold at Neiman Marcus, Pearl Art Supply, Aahs! and numerous gift shops and hair salons. For the really adventurous, get on the Internet and find a mehndi recipe. Experiment until you discover what works best for you. Just remember that henna is virtually impossible to remove from clothes, and if you get it on your nails, there is no way to get it out except cut them.

Comparative Studies of Jewish Communities in the U.S. and Abroad with a focus on

THE JEWISH EXPERIENCE IN CONTEMPORARY AMERICA

Since World War II, the story of the American Jewish Community has been one of success and achievement. The high degree of acceptability (85%) has been accompanied by a transformation of some essential features of Jewish life. Intermarriage has become the dominant marital arrangement (52%), anitsemitism has continued to decline (20%) and the political loyalties of American Jews have begun a shift that correlated with their newly gained status.

Yet, the Jewish trajectory is not uni-directional. At the same time that assimilation appears to have taken hold, many Jews have revitalized their Jewish commitments through their participation in a reinvigorated Orthodoxy, others have joined with Jewish feminists in overhauling the tradition and still others have pursued the path of Jewish spiritual renewal. This course will focus on the complex interaction of these factors and will explore the degree to which Jewish particularity has been preserved amidst rampant assimilation. The gnawing question that underlies this inquiry is whether contemporary Jewry and/or Judaism have the capacity to survive the openness and tolerance of America.

IRAQ

agreement that I will defend anywhere, and I'm sure the member states would accept it," Annan told about 700 U.N. employees pressed against blue metal barriers to congratulate him on his mission to Iraq.

"There were millions of people around the world rooting for peace," Annan told the whistling and applauding U.N. staff. "That is why I say you should never underestimate the power of prayer."

Annan thanked President Clinton and British Prime Minister Tony Blair "for being perfect U.N. peacekeepers – U.N. peacekeepers in the sense that we taught our peacekeepers that the best way to use force is to show it in order not to have to use it."

Mindful of past broken promises by Saddam, the Clinton administration said it wants the agreement to be tested.

"What is critical to us is compliance with this agreement. We want to test it soon. We want to verify it soon," Richardson said.

A U.S. concern during the council meeting was who would head the "special group" that will inspect the eight presidential sites at the heart of the latest standoff, according to a Western diplomat who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Annan said only that Richard Butler, of whom Iraq has been critical, would remain as chief U.N. weapons inspector.

> "What is critical to us is compliance with this agreement."
> Bill Richardson
> U.S. Ambassador to U.N.

Clinton ordered the U.S. military force in the Persian Gulf to remain in case Iraq reneges again. Ground and air forces continued to arrive today even as the threat of conflict eased.

The president said the United States would be "watching very closely" to see if Iraq carries out the agreement.

"Let there be no doubt we must remain committed to see that Saddam Hussein does not menace the world with weapons of mass destruction," Clinton said.

Under the accord signed Monday, Iraq would give the U.N. Special Commission that oversees inspections and the International Atomic Energy Agency "immediate, unconditional and unrestricted access" to suspected weapons sites as required by past U.N. resolutions.

However, the two-page memo stipulated that senior diplomats appointed by Annan, along with experts from UNSCOM and IAEA, would carry out inspections at eight presidential palaces.

Secretary of State Madeleine Albright insisted today that U.N. inspectors must remain in control of the search for Iraqi weapons if the agreement is to stand.

"UNSCOM has to be in operational control," she said.

The accord also reiterated the commitment of U.N. member states to "respect the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Iraq." And it addressed an issue of particular importance to Iraq – the lifting of economic sanctions imposed after Iraq invaded Kuwait in 1990, sparking the 1991 Persian Gulf War.

While it set no time line, it noted that the lifting of sanctions is "obviously of paramount importance."

INFLATION

crash of oil prices in 1986, and economists see little reason for the rate to move above 2 percent this year.

A flood of cheap imports from economically struggling Asian countries is expected to keep a lid on prices of manufactured goods and commodities.

Unseasonable winter warmth, caused by El Niño, in Europe and North America has left a glut of oil on world markets. And, if the tentative arms inspection agreement with Iraq holds, even more oil will hit the market under U.N. provisions permitting it to sell oil for food and medicine.

The principal threat of inflation comes through services. Their prices may be pushed up by rising wages stemming from shortages of labor.

In January, service prices rose just 0.1 percent, while good prices declined 0.1 percent.

Last month's energy decline was led by a 3.6 percent drop in gasoline. Fuel oil and natural gas both were down 2.7 percent and electricity was down 1 percent.

Declining beef, pork, poultry, fruit and coffee prices helped moderate the big vegetable prices increase and a moderate rise in dairy products.

Outside food and energy, clothing costs fell 0.5 percent. Medical care and new cars and trucks rose only 0.1 percent. However, tobacco products jumped 0.7 percent and airline fares, 2.7 percent.

Communication costs fell 0.4 percent, pulled down by a drop in cellular phone costs. But recreation rose 0.3 percent, reflecting a 1.7 percent rise for cable television.

Today's report is the first based on an updated market basket of goods and services that the Labor Department says better reflects Americans' buying habits in the 1990s. Cell phones and home computers, for instance, are much more prevalent than at the time of the last update in 1987. Plus Americans eat less beef and more pasta.

CORRUPTION

800 of the 2,800 agents of Mexico's former anti-drug center, the National Institute for the Combat of Drugs, would be permanently employed by his agency.

The Institute, which took a leading role in fighting drugs as part of an anti-corruption shakeup in 1995, was disbanded in 1997 after its former chief, Gen. Jesus Gutierrez Rebollo, was arrested on bribery and drug trafficking charges.

Madrazo complained that Mexico's Supreme Court recently declared unconstitutional laws that let the attorney general's office repeatedly test police for fitness.

Despite the problems, Madrazo said Mexican police and soldiers seized 1,029 metric tons of marijuana in 1997 – a figure he said was a record – as well as 35 metric tons of cocaine and almost 800 pounds of opium gum, according to Notimex.

He said his department had arrested 10,600 people on drug charges in 1997.

Madrazo criticized the U.S. laws mandating that the president "certify" other countries as cooperating in the fight against drugs and imposing sanctions on those that do not.

President Clinton must issue a new certification by March 1.

"Nothing is gained with censures and reproaches," Madrazo said, according to the daily Universal. "The basis is not mutual recrimination but collaboration and recognizing that the enemy is not Mexico nor the United States but drug trafficking."

Students need adequate representation

REGENT: Specialized board member necessary to address specific needs, complaints, perspectives

When California voters amended the state constitution in 1974, students scored a coup with the addition of one of their own to the UC Board of Regents. Since the establishment of the seat, regents and students have debated the actual role of the student regent. Regents emphasized that the student regent must think foremost as a trustee of the university, not as a student. But as student concerns get lost and ignored, it's crucial that the student regent be attuned to all the things students want addressed.

The spectrum of issues the student regent can address is broad. The student regent has full voting powers just like any other regent. The Board of Regents has the role of establishing university policy for issues such as affirmative action, student fees, admission and financial aid. The board is also responsible for overseeing the university's finances and appointing the UC president, each of the nine chancellors and the next student regent. Students have limited involvement in the student regent selection process, but the ultimate decision rests in the hands of the regents. Considering that the interests of students are often at odds with those of the regents, it is foolish that the sole student voice on the board is dictated by the board itself. The UC Students Association should have full authority over selection of the student regent.

The regents are trustees of the university, and their oversight functions provide the long-term views of the university. Yet, with a limited breadth of power, students' concerns often get blurred and go without being addressed. So it's crucial that the student regent be the one to bring our concerns to the regent table.

The student regent needs to act on behalf of the students in the university and address the things we students are concerned with. As such, the student regent needs to address issues such as maintaining diversity in the university, which can be achieved through working on outreach programs, securing adequate financial aid for students and ensuring access and opportunity to all current and prospective students.

Among the top priorities for students is fees and financial aid. The student regent needs to make sure fees stay low and financial aid is available for those who need it. The power to effect such changes lies squarely in the hands of the regents, and the student regent needs to guarantee that the university maintains excellence while being able to satisfy the needs and desires of the students.

The student regent must act as a liaison throughout the various UC campuses and keep in contact with students and student leaders from each school, taking the concerns they have and addressing them in regent sessions.

Currently, the student regent is one of our best means of influencing university policy. We need to ensure that we have a student regent who represents us and looks out for our best interests.

Acting on lustful impulses has consequences

SEX: Emotions can rule our decisions, resulting in some messy situations

Alon Frydman

Under the strobe lights and the rhythm of the sultry sounds, two bodies meet. Under the guise of love and the foolishness of trust, two bodies meet. With time and patience, two bodies, once under lights and sound, are now under sheets and sweat. With words and trust two bodies who love now lust. With perception changing, ignorance breeds deception, as the act breeds itself. From meet to heat, from heat to meat, all for the moment, stopping for nothing. To feel you with no barriers, bare, just you, no play-sex, no latex; just sex. The moment comes and goes as do they. The feeling, the closeness, everything put aside, nothing could wait. The blindness causes a sleep that puts the sheet over our eyes, not our bodies. One day we wake and realize that maybe it wasn't worth it, maybe we should have been protected.

What do we realize when it's too late? Do we realize that it was just an attraction that happened to put us in the moment, do we realize that it was supposed to be the first time and that they promised, do we realize that it was just a one-night stand, or do we realize that we had a choice? Who do you trust with your life? Who values your life more than you? No one. Not your lover, not your girlfriend, not your best friend. If they tell you that they truly do value your life, then they are lying. Only you know the true value of your life.

So many people think they are invincible, so many seem to want to do it the right way just once. The sad fact is that many people have done it – so many people that it really is sad.

If you know a couple of people, ask them, and if they are willing to tell you, chances are that it's happened. Some get tested and are relieved to find out they're OK, some make excuses, some still think there's no way anything could have happened. But those numbers are surprisingly high. You would think that with all the advertisements and all the hoopla, guys could think just a little bit beforehand and put on a condom. It really is unfortunate. What if you just weren't thinking and happened to get caught up in the heat of the moment? Come on, nothing's gonna happen; we trust each other; we're normal people. Come on, haven't you ever gotten caught up in the moment just once? Everybody does. That's the problem: Too many people trust each other; too many of us are willing to put our lives in the hands of some imaginary pyramid of trust, all to experience it the natural way just once without having to feel like we're on some experiment.

It's not natural – I don't think sex should be that way, some say. Really? Well you're not Adam and she's not Eve – trust me, she may have given him the apple that caused him to cover himself, but what you're gonna get these days is a lot more bitter. Like Adam, your ass will have already been exposed.

We can crack a few jokes, laugh at the situation and take it lightly for the moment. True, there's no reason to get heavy unless we're eatin', and

Make a difference by teaching for America

By Wendy Kopp

Innovative program lets college graduates guide children

Eight years ago, I started Teach For America because I was convinced that hundreds of talented, motivated graduating seniors would commit two years to teach students in urban and rural areas. I felt that a national teacher corps could fundamentally change our country – by providing more educational opportunities for some of our nation's most underserved students, and by shaping the consciousness of a generation of individuals who will ultimately hold leadership positions in all sectors of America.

Now, seven years later, having seen firsthand the realities facing communities everywhere from South Central Los Angeles to the Mississippi Delta to the South Bronx, I am only more passionate about the need for Teach For America. I am only more certain that our nation's students and schools demand the attention of its most talented individuals. I am only more thoughtful in calling upon you to become part of a movement to build our country's future.

It is impossible to capture in a short letter what we have learned about the severity of the challenges facing some of our nation's young people. Suffice it to say that they do not have anything near an equal opportunity to an excellent education. They grow up in communities where poverty makes it difficult to focus on education, and they attend schools which lack basic resources, suffer from a dearth of extra-curricular activities and don't even have enough people to fill teaching positions. They live in a society that too often holds low expectations for them.

These students more than any others need committed and talented teachers who hold high expectations for them, who are creative in spite of a lack of resources and committed to doing whatever it takes to reach them. At the same time, our nation at large needs leaders who understand the realities facing students in our nation's most underresourced areas and are committed to changing these realities.

Over the past seven years, more than 4,000 recent college graduates – from all academic majors and ethnic backgrounds – have taught through Teach For America in 13 areas across the country. They have brought to their schools a tremendous sense of possibility, a contagious enthusiasm and most of all, a passionate commitment to their students.

They have started extra-curricular programs, led school improvement initiatives and rewritten school curriculum. They have visited their students' homes and communicated regularly with their parents. They have expanded the horizons of their students by introducing them to college and by taking them on trips everywhere from France to Washington, D.C. They have had an incredibly challenging time, but they have also made a real difference.

I have no doubt that our corps members will soon be the leaders who are effecting needed systematic changes. Many are still teaching beyond their two-year commitments and have assumed significant leadership responsibilities in their schools. Others are starting schools or working for education reform

Blowing smoke

Rob Kariakin, you have failed your drug test. Apparently, you know very little about marijuana and its effects. Before you get back on your soap box, allow me to identify your article's mistakes ("NBA union's tactics show disregard for drug policy," Feb. 12) and then clarify them.

Claim: Marijuana is more carcinogenic than cigarettes.

Truth: UCLA's Dr. Donald Tashkin concluded a long-term study on smoking in 1997 and found that marijuana smokers had the same rate of contracting cancer as people who didn't smoke at all. Cigarette smokers had much higher rates of cancer.

Some studies (albeit on lab animals) show that marijuana may even function as an anti-carcinogen. There has never been a case of someone contracting cancer from the use of marijuana.

Claim: "If you smoke pot for a while, you can't breathe as well."

Truth: Marijuana smoke travels primarily through the lung's main passageways, while cigarette smoke infiltrates the smaller passageways. This fact explains why marijuana is sometimes prescribed to asthmatics in order to open their constricted breathing passageways. It also explains why cigarette smoke can cause emphysema while marijuana cannot.

Claim: "... Pot affects higher logic."

Truth: Obviously, pot has some effect on the brain or else no one would want to smoke it. However, those effects are often positive and always benign. No scientific study has ever proven that marijuana causes brain damage.

Claim: Marijuana smokers do not make good role models.

Truth: Simply violating a law does not render someone a poor role model. By using your logic, from this claim it follows that people like Martin Luther King Jr. and Gandhi are unworthy role models since they often broke unjust laws.

Pot smokers have accomplished right now you're reading. But everyone has a feast now and then, whether it's fast food, the usual place or even fine dining; try and make it a habit to bring your utensils. Otherwise things can get real messy, and you don't want any permanent stains.

What does it take to make the threat of AIDS real? What does it take to get you to realize that this is not bullshit? How many people have to throw away their lives because they want to enjoy sex more? It's just plain stupid. People die from HIV, and the other diseases don't make your smile any brighter – nor does a natural garden of mushrooms on your body. If you haven't done it yourself, then ask yourself if you or any of your friends could get into this situation. Ask yourself if it truly is possible. Does it have something to do with will, something to do with understanding cause and effect, or does it have to do with common sense?

> What do we realize when it's too late? ... Do we realize that it was just a one-night stand, or do we realize that we had a choice?

Ask yourself some more questions, like how much do you like to share your time with people you love? When we are with friends we all talk and laugh, we do the things that come to mind and talk about things that move the heart.

Days, months or years later we sit by a friend. The smile now has turned to nothing, the laughter has turned to stillness, the life has turned to death. The memories haunt while the present seems intangible. We watch until the final day, and even on that day, one moment we look at each other and exchange words; the next, he looks at you in an exchange of silence. Hours can pass, looking on and wondering, trying to take in the fact as it seems to be fiction. It is sorry. It is a shame. We don't want to accept it. We try not to, but the silence screams as the reality stands. Death. It truly is the end. You have no power, no control. You let go long before, but now the consequence seems too much to pay. If only we could go back; you're sure it wouldn't have to be this way, you're sure they would do it right. You stare, and as more and more people slowly leave, you are still there staring, you are the last one, you still can't grasp it. Why won't they wake up? It's all a trick – wake up, nice try, you can wake up now.

Unfortunately after hours of talking to an empty body you realize that sleeping eyes do not wake; they sleep forever. You still have time. Open your eyes. You have one life, one chance, one choice; it's yours to make.

> The NBA does not have rules banning every crime that can possibly be committed.

The NBA does not have rules banning every crime that can possibly be committed. Would a player be suspended for polluting? How about for domestic violence? What about using a pirate cable box?

Clearly, the NBA cannot legislate every aspect of a player's off-court, personal life. If some NBA players can light up joints like they light up the court, what business of yours is that? If you want to speak in terms of damage to one's career, then a prison sentence is far worse than a hundred marijuana highs.

The marijuana-using NBA players have advanced their careers this far without the heavy-handed, "reefer mad" advice of pot prohibitionists like yourself.

Please show some regard for their outstanding achievements. Until you learn more about marijuana, then you're the one who has really failed the drug test.

Recent biography finds untold story of 'cosmic mates'

BOOK: Novice author researches tragic relationship between Jim Morrison and his long-time love

By Stacy Sare
Daily Bruin Contributor

After quitting her job as a secretary and flying to Paris, author Patricia Butler found herself being chased by police and hiding in an open grave to escape tear gas, beatings and riot squads. She had walked into the middle of a melee. What was all the fuss about?

It was the 20th anniversary of Jim Morrison's death and the singer was still stirring up a commotion.

Now Butler sits at Border's Cafe, sipping a cup of coffee and getting ready to promote her recently published book, "Angels Dance and Angels Die." The book tells the love story between The Doors frontman, rock legend and former UCLA film student, Jim Morrison and his soul mate, Pamela. Butler recalls the harrowing experience that led her to six years of extensive research and the publication of her book.

While officials at Pere Lachaise cemetery expected only 500 fans, 5,000 showed up. But they assumed shutting "the doors" on Jim Morrison was going to be an easy feat. When guards tried to close the cemetery gates, hell broke loose.

But in the cemetery plot, Butler didn't know what was happening, either.

"While I was sitting there (in the grave), I started wondering what the hell was going on and who causes this much trouble after being dead for so long," Butler recalls. "I started asking around, hearing fans' stories and learned that some people had blown their life savings just to come for the day."

Fans' stories amazed Butler. "I wasn't a fan of The Doors or Jim," Butler says. "I didn't know anything about him. That's why I was so taken aback. I started asking around and just listening to people express emotions about Morrison and tell me more about the story and it really interested me."

This experience inspired Butler to write "Angels Dance and Angels Die."

"When I got home, my friends said, 'Well, you just had a big adventure, what are you going to do now?' and I just said without thinking, 'I'm going to write a book about Jim and Pam Morrison.'" Butler says.

Fifteen years ago "Terms of Endearment" was a big Academy Award winner, taking five Oscars. This year "As Good As it Gets," has been nominated for seven awards. Besides sharing the label of "sentimental comedy," these movies also share three people – a director, actor and editor: James Brooks, Jack Nicholson and Richard Marks, respectively.

Many may be familiar with the multi-Academy Award winning director and actor, Brooks and Nicholson. But as both a renowned editor and a UCLA professor in the television and film production department, Marks may also get to add the coveted "Academy Award-winning" prefix to his slightly less familiar name.

Marks is currently in contention for the Oscar in the Best Film Editing category for his work on "As Good As It Gets."

"It's very thrilling," Marks says. "When you finish working on a project that consumed well over a year of my life, it's nice to get recognition."

This is Marks' fourth Oscar nomination; he received his last film editing nomination in 1988 for "Broadcast News." He was also a nominee for the films "Apocalypse Now" and "Terms of Endearment."

Despite his impressive editing history, Marks has never won an Oscar. Editing mostly comedies and dramas, Marks impairs his chances at victory. Those genres are not usually considered, much less winners of the Best Film Editing category. In fact, action films traditionally dominate.

Odyssey plays everyone in audience for the fool

THEATER: Show questions moral, intellectual issues facing present-day people

By Sam Toussi
Daily Bruin Contributor

When you drive up to the Odyssey Theatre Ensemble, the theater looks like little more than a factory outlet or an imitation furniture store. When you go inside, though, you find a theater that is among the best in Los Angeles The only thing that the Odyssey fails to do is disappoint.

The Odyssey Theatre Ensemble's West Coast premiere of "The Jumping Fool" is no exception. The guest production is the most recent in a string of attracting talent to the Odyssey Theatre.

Written and directed by Shirl Herndryx, the play begins auspiciously with the lead character (the play is essentially a one-man show) telling the audience that he's conned them into showing up. Good for him. Benoy (Charles Lucia) is a prominent journalist with a beautiful wife he's in love with and two good kids. He's got friends, he's got money, he's got everything. Then one day he runs into an acrobat on the beach, whom he accidentally insults, and his life begins to dissolve. All of a sudden, he can't stop thinking about the acrobat. He repeatedly goes to the acrobat's loft, searching for an answer as to why he feels so hollow.

"The Jumping Fool" leaves each audience member to take what he or she will from the play so no interpretation would be entirely valid. But the play is definitely existential and asks some questions that we've all asked, questions about who we are and why we exist.

On the verge of the millennium, how have we advanced beyond animal status? Does what we do in our daily lives mean more or less than what they did one thousand years ago?

It's frustrating, and Hendryx's script exploits that frustration eloquently. The script revolves around the same thought for prolonged periods of time without any answers. But that's the point. From the moment Lucia steps onstage and tells us that what we are about to see really isn't a play, Hendryx puts the audience and Benoy in the same boat. Benoy is the everyday man and through him Hendryx attempts to explore theatrically the frustration everyone has felt at one time or another.

Lucia plays the part of a breaking man with a great deal of skill. Every facial move is justified, causing the audience to move with every emotion he has. As Lucia's Benoy begins to dissolve into insanity, the audience begins to shift nervously at once because they hate to see the main character suffer and then because they want Benoy to find his way.

The acrobat (Philip R. Allen) doesn't help anyone. For every question Benoy asks, the acrobat answers with a cryptic reply which brings us no closer to any answers.

Allen's performance is over-the-top and perfectly justified. With his exaggerated Eastern European accent and maniacal laughs his character is obviously symbolic. Allen provides insights on just what the character symbolizes by being as crazy as he is onstage. Every laugh (more like a cackle) and every outburst helps the audience along the theme of the play. While the acrobat drives Benoy crazy, he relieves the audience to a certain extent.

If Lucia's Benoy shows the audience frustration, it is his wife Maria (Terry Diab) who exhibits the feeling of helplessness that seems to be the soul of the play.

Diab plays a strong, intelligent woman who watches helplessly as her husband disintegrates before her eyes. The choices she makes as an actress are touching and sympathetic. At Benoy's lowest point, she resists bawling, choosing instead to speak with a pent-up tear that's even more heartbreaking.

"The Jumping Fool" is an intellectually tickling and haunting play. With a combination of style and substance, it is a contemporary morality play that's more than worthy of a look and a thought.

THEATER: "The Jumping Fool" runs through March 22 at the Odyssey Theatre Ensemble on Sepulveda just north of Olympic. Tickets are $20 on Fridays and Saturdays and $15 on Thursdays and Sundays, with discounts for students. Call (310) 477-2055 for more information.

DJ Premier, "Haze presents ... New York Reality Check 101" (Payday) Mix tapes are like potpourri for the ears. They afford the listener the opportunity to sample many different artists, themes, styles and much more. Mix tapes have long held a special place in hip-hop culture, allowing DJs (armchair and professional alike) to showcase their mixing skills.

Funkmaster Flex brought the mix tape into a new era with the introduction of his anthology, "60 Minutes of Funk, Volumes 1 & 2." The widespread popularity of these two joints proved the commercial viability of nationally distributed mixed tapes.

Enter DJ Premier, beatmaster behind the platinum-selling group Gangstarr, and now with New York Reality Check 101. Premo, as he is affectionately known, came to flex his muscles on the wheels of steel.

Warning: If you want to dance, this is not the album to buy. There are no smoothed-out R&B hooks or remakes of previous classics. There are no thumping bass lines designed to make your ass shake. However, if you're interest is in the basic hip hop formula of beats and rhymes, you cannot go wrong. New York Reality Check 101 is for the listener who appreciates straight-forward lyrical flow and hard-hitting boom-bap beats.

The simplicity of this album is its strongest selling point. There aren't any standout performances. Yet New York Reality Check 101 has the feel of a true hip-hop club. Not the kind of establishment where the Big Willies are flossin' the latest Versace and poppin' Crystal, but where hoodies, baggy jeans and boots are the norm.

A.J. Croce, "Fit to Serve" (RUF/ Platinum/ Polygram) While most people have always admired the soul in R&B and think that jazz is one the coolest things on earth, modern blues-rock artists haven't received as much mainstream airplay as the alternative and pop genres. Blame it on the conformist love for poppy rock and Star 98.7 FM.

But after listening to A.J. Croce's newest release, "Fit to Serve," a fun and spicy combination of New Orleans blues and rock, the talented son of '70s singer Jim Croce may convert more pop listeners into soul fans with his energetic and incredibly catchy ballads about love and heartbreak.

In his third album, Croce's band is limited to the barest essentials: bassist Dave Curtis, drummer Paul Kimbarow and himself on the piano. With only the trio featured in the music, Croce's powerful piano playing is showcased throughout the entire album. Since Croce has played the piano professionally since the age of 17, his expertise and mastery of the instrument is admirably evident, especially in the tracks "Trouble in Mind," "Texas Ruby" and "Too Late."

Croce's deep, gravel-like voice compliments his soulful, romantic odes to love nicely. The title track catches the listener's attention right away, setting the mood for the mercurial album. The rest of the tracks range from mellow tunes like "Uncommon Sense" to happy, bouncy songs like "I'll Get Through." "Nobody Else" a bittersweet love song that features Croce's unique voice and piano playing to a harmonious climax, is easily the standout on the album.

A.J. Croce brings a refreshing Cajun flavor to pop music, but doesn't stray far enough from the mainstream to alarm any fragile KIIS-FM listeners out there. Aimee Phan A-

The Smooths, "Very Own Vegas" (Polygram) Bands such as Reel Big Fish, Mighty Mighty Bosstones and the like found 1997 a great year for their genre. Third-wave ska dazzled kids everywhere with its hyper tunes and laid-back attitude. They have also paved the way for smaller bands to seize their moment in the spotlight. The debut album, "Very Own Vegas," proves The Smooths can shine as brightly as their predecessors.

After touring with bands such as The Pietasters and Reel Big Fish, this Baltimore band decided it was time to produce their own compilation of reggae, ska and pop-punk picks. Its own mix of danceable beats is perfect for any fan of playful tunes.

The swingin' style of the album's first song, "In The Grass," starts the album with the type of energy that often leads to hits. Jazzy pick "78th of Soon" and more reggae-ish "Letter After J" demonstrate the band's versatile style and talent. Their humor also can be found in quirky little interludes such as the "Inspector Gadget" theme belted during the song "Lord Jack."

Some songs such as "Property is Theft" rely on generic ska-beats, however, to carry the rhythm. It doesn't happen too often but does mark the album's only weakness.

Even still, there are no shortage of foot-tapping, head-bopping beats in this album. It is also apparent that The Smooths would be a terrific live band. The combo makes this album a must-have for the die-hard ska collector, placing it in line with other small indie hits such as The Aquabats and Cherry Poppin' Daddies. Michelle Zubiate B+

The Apples in Stereo, "Tone Soul Evolution" (Sire) Let's take a fantastic journey back to the late '60s; put on some vinyl of the latest American folk-pop and enjoy the relaxed music of the time.

Fast forward to the present and the same American rock-flavored music is alive and sporting bell-bottoms with The Apples in Stereo's, "Tone Soul Evolution."

Either on purpose or by accident, the Apples embody the harmonious philosophy present in early Beatles' songs. They have carried over the formula that worked back in the lava lamp days and dragged it back into the mainstream. The non-threatening lyrics, mellow guitar picking, the strategically placed "ahs" and clapping during the chorus leaves no doubt that these guys spent a lot of late nights listening to vintage hippie rock.

Yet the music is also irresistibly catchy and hard to turn off. Vocalist Robert Schneider brings a soft feminine touch to his vocals and on occasion sounds exactly like Paul McCartney or John Lennon. There is no one stand-out-and-shout single on the disc; in fact, the album flows in a single upbeat tempo, which makes it hard to distinguish one song from the next. The chorus and arrangements provide simple straightforward rhythms that holds the ear for the duration of a given song.

Not the best of tunes out there, but in a scene dominated by Hanson and Spice Girls' records, the Apples will attract flashback-starved listeners. Trinh Bui a.k.a T-Dawg B-

BUTLER

Butler admits to being clueless about where to go from there.

"I didn't know how to write. I wasn't a writer. I was a secretary still."

Butler had to practice her skill at the pen just to get to talk to people. The novice writer also knew she didn't want to focus on Jim's life as a rock star. She knew there were other books out there on Morrison.

"There was 'Jim Morrison the rock star.' There was 'Jim Morrison the rock star I fucked.' There was 'Jim Morrison the rock star who was my friend.' And that was about it," Butler says.

"I was more interested in all the things that led up to him being put in that position and all the things that went into making him the person who made all the decisions and the actions he did," Butler continues.

At first, Butler was going to write the book about Pamela, who died of a heroin overdose in 1974, three years after Jim's death, because nobody seemed to know anything about her. But Butler soon learned how inseparable Jim and Pam really were.

"In order to understand everything that Jim did, I needed to understand everything that Pamela did as well," Butler says. "I needed to have an equal understanding of her and her motivations. Before long, I understood that the real story was the two of them."

The author admits confronting the biggest fears she had in her life during the researching process.

"I hated it," Butler says. "I was very shy. I didn't like to talk to people. And here I was put in a position where I had to call total strangers and ask them to tell me the most intimate details of their lives. Before I picked up the phone, a lot of times, I'd actually run to the bathroom and throw up. I would be so scared."

Schirmer Books

Patricia Butler wrote "Angels Dance and Angels Die."

Another scary aspect was having to re-live her subjects' lives by listening to their friends and reading their works.

"You have to put yourself through a lot of what they went through," Butler states. "Sometimes, it's really hard, especially with a subject like Jim and Pam because it's so tragic. I'm sitting in a house of autopsy reports and police reports and I have a body diagram on my wall and I can tell you how much Pam's liver weighed ... stuff like that. It's tough to live with that every day."

On a more positive note, what amazed Butler was how much faith Jim's friends and family placed in her.

"They would take family photos that nobody had seen before. They'd take them out of the scrapbook and mail them to me and trust that I would return them," Butler says.

All of this research led to the inevitable question: How did Jim and Pam meet?

Imagine the typical romantic scenario. "Jim saw her across a crowded room. They were together from that night on," Butler tells.

> "When Pamela and Jim met, it was two kindred spirits together."
> Patricia Butler
> Author

She says people were surprised to find out that Jim said Pam was his 'cosmic mate,' and had no idea about how much Jim and Pam had in common. Yet she also sees the two as being off-the-cuff. "I think they were different from their peers. They had been the odd folks out there their whole lives," Butler explains. "They didn't have a lot of close friends. They didn't have much interest in 'fitting in.' When Pamela and Jim met, it was two kindred spirits together."

"I think that's what Jim meant by calling Pamela his 'cosmic mate,'" Butler continues, "because they seemed to be the same. It wasn't just some silly phrase. (Doors keyboardist) Ray Manzarek said, 'They were two halves of the same person.'" They stayed home and cooked, went to foreign films alone and went to other countries to shop for Pam's clothing store, "Themis."

Their relationship, however, had rocky times as well. "What got between them was Jim's alcoholism and his fame," Butler states. "They were in strange circumstances. The band was a big factor that came between them. Pam was always encouraging Jim to leave the band. She thought they were sucking him dry and not giving him anything in return. She wanted him to go be a poet ... not a rock star."

Jim's and Pam's lives ended up like a Romeo and Juliet tragedy. Three years after Jim Morrison was found dead in his bathtub, Pamela Courson died of a heroin overdose.

Readers of "Angels Dance and Angels Die," have been moved by this poignant love story.

"After reading the book, I feel that Pam and Jim were definite soul mates," says 26-year-old Doors fan Pamela Davis. "I liked the book because they went more into Pam. I knew in my heart that he was too intelligent to go with someone who was such an airhead, like in the (Oliver Stone) movie ."

MARKS

the nomination an honor presented by peers.

"In the case of drama/comedy which is what "As Good As It Gets" is, recognition of film editing is not always done," Marks says. "So I think it is particularly gratifying for me to be nominated this year."

Marks did not foresee his successful film editing career while in college. Attending New York University, Marks became interested in film but received a degree in English literature.

"It had nothing to do with film. I just sort of slid into working in film in a very serendipitous way," Marks says.

Marks started in the industry doing low-paying entry-level work in commercial editorial houses as opposed to a start in academia.

"My first break was carrying film cans around New York City," Marks says.

Since then, Marks has progressed to become an Oscar-quality editor, working closely with director James Brooks. Together, Marks and Brooks have completed three potential Oscar sweepers.

"I think that I've done more films with Jim (Brooks) than any other single director," Marks says. "You start to be able to anticipate the other person's thoughts."

Marks' relationships with directors allow him to bring out the best in films. In the editing room, Marks senses the performance and the mood it conveys.

"In Richard's case, what makes him especially good is his sensitivity to the emotion of the moment," says Howard Suber, co-chair of UCLA's Independent Television and Film Producers Program. "He makes actors look brilliant."

"We're really extraordinarily lucky to have (Marks)."

Howard Suber
Co-chair, UCLA Independent Television and Film Producers Program

In UCLA's film production program, all students are expected to edit their own films. For 10 years, Marks has taught advanced editing courses.

"Richie enlightens us with the editing process," says Joe Neulight, a graduate student in the directing program.

Marks' peers on the faculty feel similarly about his talent and teaching ability.

"He's in a very enviable position and we're really extraordinarily lucky to have him," Suber says. "Given how much professional demand is placed around his time and energy, it's a wonder he has time to continue teaching."

Although Marks is extremely busy, he was at home the morning the Academy Award nominations were released. Marks and his wife were waiting near their phone, hoping it would ring.

"The Academy Award nominations come out so early in the morning," Marks says. "You sort of know if your phone rings that you've gotten the nomination and if it doesn't ring, you know you haven't."

On the morning the nominations were released, Marks was among others in the film industry waiting for the most important phone call of the year. Was he expecting that fateful phone call?

"The truth is you try not to think about it," Marks says. "You always hope that it will happen, but really if you are sane at all, you try not to think about those things."

How to Write an Effective Ad
- Start your ad with the merchandise you are selling. This makes it easier for readers to quickly scan the ads and locate your items.
- Always include the price of your item. Many classified readers simply do not respond to ads without prices.
- Avoid abbreviations—make you ad easy for readers to understand.
- Place yourself in the reader's position, ask what you would like to know about the merchandise, and include that in the ad. Include such information as brand names, colors and other specific descriptions.

The ASUCLA Communications board fully supports the University of California's policy on nondiscrimination, no medium shall accept advertisements which present persons of any origin, race, sex, or sextual orientation in a demeaning way or imply that they are limited to positions, capabilities, roles, or status in society. Neither the Daily Bruin nor the the ASUCLA Communications Board has investigated ay of the services advertised or the advertisements represented in this issue. Any person believing that an advertisement in this issue violated the Board's policy on nondiscrimination stated herein should communicate complaints in writing to the Business Manager, Daily Bruin, 118 Kerckhoff Hall, 308 Westwood Plaza, Los Angeles, CA 90024. For assistance with housing discrimination problems, call the UCLA Housing Office at (310) 825-4271 or call the Westside Fair Housing Office at (310) 475-9671. Classified ads also appear on-line at http://www.dailybruin.ucla.edu. Placement on-line is offered as a complimentary service for customers and is not guaranteed.

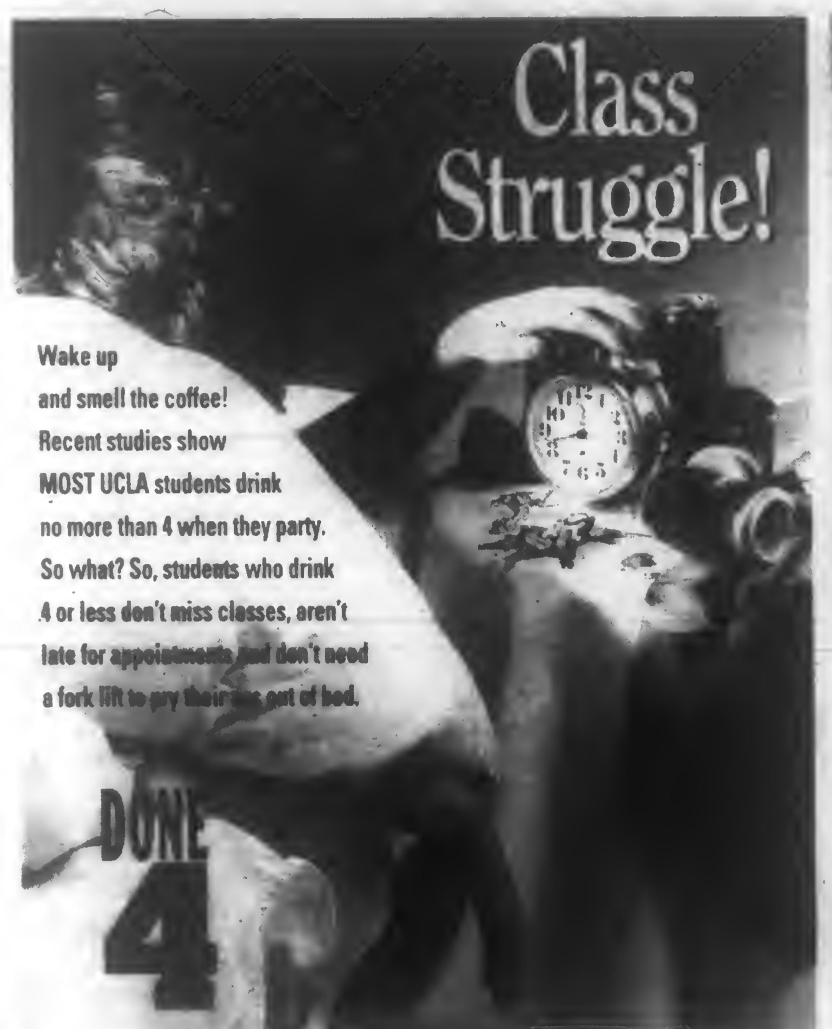
CALIFORNIA CLINICAL TRIALS



Good morning sunshine Well today it looks more like good afternoon sleepy head! This particular person of privilege seems to be having some trouble with her morning routine. The night before she demonstrated her social graces with her fellow socialites by shmoozing (and boozing) at an informal social gathering of some of the most prominent pupils on campus. However, it looks like she's going to have a hard time making it to her social studies lecture on time. Not to say that she has no class, but the one she has today will suffer due to her so called social-izing. Etiquette, dignity, exquisite manners, and all other amenities have been lost in a morning of misery that started the first time the alarm went off (nine or ten sleeps of the snooze button earlier). Is she fit for society? Sure she is. Is she a social outcast? No, of course not! But she might suffer from a common social disease. Some people feel that they have to get fall down blotto to have a good time. But more often than not they ask themselves the age old question: "why did I drink so much?" Or they declare the ultimate in social statements: "I'll never do that again!" The cure to this oh so common ailment is quite simple; don't over-do it dumb ass! Most UCLA students drink four or less when they party. Some don't drink at all. So be class conscious! When you've done 4, you're done.

SWIMMING

After an intense regular season of training and weightlifting, swimmers are taped, rested and shaved for this anticipated collegiate event, which also explains their peaking at this time of the year.

The Pac-10s are a prelude to the NCAAs, and many swimmers look to make the qualifying times this weekend in order to compete at the national collegiate championships.

"This is what we've been looking forward to all season – the entire team for the Pac-10s and the 10 or 12 that make it to the NCAAs," Gallagher said. "So we are looking for some fast times."

The Pac-10 conference boasts the greatest concentration of top swimming teams in the nation, including the defending national champion USC Trojans and also the former champion Stanford Cardinal. The Bruins' forté rests in the relay events, and they recently beat the Trojans in the relays during a dual-team meet.

"Relays are really important," Gallagher said. "We have a lot of Bruin pride and it's something we're focusing to do great on. We're looking for a little revenge because we just didn't have that great of a dual-meet season. So we're looking to show everybody how good we are at Pac-10s."

Major Bruin individual contributors will include Cindy Bertelink in the distance events, Jill Jenkins in the sprints and backstrokes, Lindsay Etter and Amber Wines in the breaststrokes, and Keiko Price in the sprints.

Swimmers such as Jackie Castellano, Beth Goodwin, Becky Thompson and Lindsey Masterson are expected to contribute to the crucial relay events, as well as individual races.

But the Pac-10 Championships are more than fast races and intense competition. The event also acts to showcase the swimmers' achievements and improvements in front of their parents and supporters.

"The Pac-10s are fun because they're a whole-team event," says senior breaststroker Etter. "I like the energy that's created from the championships. All the parents are there and they have signs. It's a huge team event, like a production. I'd like to see a great finish."

"Everybody has fun and the parents are going to be there," said teammate Price. "Our relays are going to be good, and that's the meet where everybody gives their best times. It'll be a good meet."

So the Pac-10s have finally arrived, and Gallagher couldn't be more excited. The Bruins have some of the most spirited swimmers in the conference, and they don't plan on quieting down for this big event. In fact, Gallagher has been seeing a definite increase in team spirit.

"I'm excited to watch these girls swim because they've been getting fired up, and it's really hard to get fired up in the rain, you know? So they've been doing a really good job. They've shown what they're made of against USC – the spirit and the heart that they have. We're looking for things to pay off."

year to the Midwest, and to the Southeast in 1996.

By NCAA rules, no team from any conference will place in the same region as the top-seeded team from its conference.

Since Arizona is a virtual lock to gain the top seed in the West, the Bruins figure to head elsewhere for the third consecutive year.

Bruin wire services contributed to this story.

KNIGHT

their last game, a 121-96 loss in Portland, getting out-rebounded by an astounding total of 21. On the season, teams are out-rebounding them by nearly 3.5 a game.

That doesn't sound like a lot until you use rebounding theory: an offensive rebound for you means another shot at the hoop; a defensive rebound for you keeps the ball from the other guy. Now factor in that the Celtics lose by an average of 3 points a night. Then consider that newcomer Kenny Anderson surmised Tuesday that the Celtics "should have won seven or eight more games." Rebounding could have made the difference in those games.

Maybe the Orlando fans were making faces at O'Neal because they know they need him.

"Twenty-eight other teams in the league would love to have a guy like that," Knight said. The Celtics included. But Knight isn't going to morph into O'Neal.

As players left practice Tuesday, Knight mentioned that he would have to leave soon. He was on his way to the weight room.

DODGERS

rience than Hubbard. Howard, Devereaux, Hubbard and Billy Ashley will be competing for spots as reserve outfielders.

"It feels a little bewildering, to be honest with you," Hubbard said. "But the Dodgers want to win. Ultimately, they'll go with the people who they feel give them the best chance to win."

Hubbard first arrived in the majors in 1994 with Colorado, but the strike ended the season prematurely. The San Francisco Giants claimed him off the waiver wire the following year, but Hubbard broke his hand shortly after replacing an injured Barry Bonds in the starting lineup.

Hubbard was traded to the Indians after the 1996 season in the trade that also brought Matt Williams to Cleveland. After the Indians traded for David Justice and Marquis Grissom at the end of spring training, Hubbard got just seven at-bats in Cleveland's crowded outfield.

"It seems I've had a lot of bad luck so far," Hubbard said. "Hopefully the good luck begins here."

HUMMEL

into the sports world by naming a hockey team – among a field of teams ranging from the Blackhawks to the Sabres to the Redwings – the Ducks.

This team has had little success so far, but this can be expected from a relatively new franchise. Despite the lame name, I will cut him a break this time.

A few years later Mickey started to get personal when he sunk his tiny incisors into baseball – specifically, my beloved California Angels.

I realize he's cute with his little whiskers and soprano voice, but the moment he bought into this team, he changed its look with reckless abandon.

Before Mickey's intervention, California Angel paraphernalia had reached an all-time high in sales with its new logo, which had been brought back from the original Angel uniforms of the 1960s.

Mickey, however, would have none of it.

He is not happy with the mere acquisition of a franchise. If Mickey owns something, that something must reek of rodent.

Translation: If a franchise becomes a "Mickey franchise", every drop of respectability or anything on the uniform which might be construed as intimidating must be eighty-sixed.

The result: A "new-improved" logo which features angelic wings: white as snow and fluffy as a cumulus cloud, lifting the "A" skybound accompanied with periwinkle jerseys.

Let me say that again so that it sinks in:

Periwinkle.

You know the color I'm talking about. The one that stays permanently sharp in every young boy's Crayola 64 crayon set due to non-use, along with lavender, rose and pink.

Of course, like the hockey team, this ingenious move on Mickey's part was prompted by a movie, "Angels in the Outfield."

In order to get us up to date on Mickey's financial decisions regarding professional athletics, I'll jump ahead to earlier this month.

Mickey's latest ploy (in his pursuit of world dominance) was a series of billboards scattered around the Orange County area promoting the renovation of Anaheim Stadium and its renaming. The signs read "Kiss your 'Big A' goodbye. There's a brand new theme park in Anaheim. Edison Field. The ultimate playground."

Theme park?

Playground?

I realize that kids love sports, and I wouldn't want it any other way, but do we have to build franchises and ball parks which cater to children exclusively?

For the record, Mickey is throwing aside the name "Anaheim Stadium" or "The Big A" for $1.4 million per year from an electric company.

The new title: the Edison International Field of Anaheim. Now that's a mouthful. Can you imagine a kid asking his father, "Daddy, I want to see the Angels play! Can you please take me to the Edison International Field of Anaheim?"

The Big "A" has been around since the stadium was built in '66. I realize that the Angels are nowhere near a storied team. They are a perennially losing team and have never been to the World Series, but tradition is tradition.

Tradition might not mean much in all sports, but baseball is driven by tradition. Changing the name of a stadium just for some extra change, which is all $1.4 million is to Mickey, is unfeeling and lacks any sense of integrity or respect for the game.

Just for good measure, I'll mention, for those who are not aware that Mickey owns both ESPN and ABC, last month he shelled out over $9 billion over eight years to the NFL for the television rights to "Monday Night Football" and the entire cable television package, knocking Time Warner's Turner Broadcasting Inc. out of contention for this honor. On top of this, a source close to Mickey said he will undoubtedly bid for NBC's "ER," which will become available soon.

Is there any doubt that Mickey will not stop until he has the world held safely between his minute paws?

It's really a tragedy. This loveable little rodent I loved so dearly as a child has been transformed into a snarling, drooling creature with rabies, bearing his fangs, looking determinedly for new prey.

What's next?

I can see it now:

Mickey ears on top of the Big "A" structure (which he was so generous in sparing).

Donald Duck giving the half-time report.

Or maybe a new basketball franchise named the Dalmatians – the players wearing polka-dotted uniforms and a yipping canine sound bite on the P.A. after every Dalmatian basket.

in the conference and fourth in both hitting percentage and kills per game.

Scates attributes the low blocking numbers to the fact that opponents spend more time hitting the ball out rather than challenging the UCLA block.

He also commented that while many of the Bruins' opponents have one or two go-to players, UCLA has five players that can be set at any one time. Setter Brandon Taliaferro is also a threat, averaging a kill a game with his deceptive attacking.

"We don't have anybody with big numbers. Adam Naeve is the biggest, but he's only (averaged) a little over five (kills per game). It means we spread it out."

Injury update

Junior Eric Valleyly will take this week off to rest his ankle. Valleyly, UCLA's backup setter, injured his ankle several weeks ago against Loyola Marymount. Although he took time off to rest it then, his ankle has continued to give him problems.

Knight pumps up to fill Celtic shoes

BASKETBALL: Ex-Laker strives to be better center, record less bench time

By Michael Holley
The Associated Press

BOSTON – Cameras panned the Orlando Arena crowd during the Lakers-Magic game Sunday. You could see thousands of Floridians seething. Their anger was directed at Shaquille O'Neal, the former Magic center. They said bad things about the man. Travis Knight would never do that.

You could say O'Neal helped pave the $22 million road on which Knight began to walk in July. That's when the Celtics signed the former Laker reserve to a seven-year contract. Last season, when Knight learned "that I couldn't stop Shaq," the 300-pound O'Neal would read double teams and quickly deliver the ball to the svelte Knight for easy layups.

"Now I'm not playing with a guy like that," Knight said Tuesday. "I'm expected to be that guy."

He knows he is not. Knight weighs 65 pounds less than O'Neal. In fact, according to the numbers, he is 10 pounds lighter than Antoine Walker. He is tall and thin, more reed stalk than concrete monolith. You may want Knight to dance around an opposing big man, but you don't want him in a half-court tug-of-war. His natural position is truly power forward. But lately, he has been on the bench more than the court.

"It's a difficult situation for me right now," he said. "I wouldn't say that I've lost confidence in myself; I still have the same skills I had last year. But this year I have to concentrate on the physical aspect of the game more than I did last year."

That's because the Celtics as a team are the anti-Shaq. Rick Pitino has commented that they look like a college team physically. Knight said the Lakers worked out on their own last year. But under Pitino, the Celtics are required to lift weights under the supervision of strength coach Shaun Brown.

Knight has followed the plan. He said he is trying to "change my body." But you wonder whether it's in his genes. He can be stronger, certainly. Will he ever be strong enough to be an everyday banger at center? Even the smaller men with strength who play center, such as Alonzo Mourning (he's really only 6 feet 9 inches), become injury-prone when tangling with giants night after night.

So now when games begin, Knight is usually on the bench behind the more physical Andrew DeClercq. In fact, he's been on the bench a lot. After he played 29 minutes in front of his friends in Salt Lake City, Knight's minutes have unfolded like this: 18, 11, 18, 13, 13, 15. If you wanted to chart overall progress, you could say that his rebounds, blocks, points and minutes are all well ahead of last season's pace. But those are just numbers. They don't necessarily reflect the truth.

Knight knows he has to spend this summer becoming more of a center than a power forward. Brown will help with that.

"He pushes me," Knight said. "When you work out by yourself, like we did last year, sometimes it's hard to motivate yourself. He does that and I think it's good for me; I need it."

He needs it and his team needs it. The Celtics were pushed aside in

Minor-league veteran hopes for spot in Dodgers' lineup

BASEBALL: With limited play in majors, Hubbard tired of temporary status

The Associated Press

Vero Beach, Fla. – Trenidad Hubbard, playing for his fourth organization in the last two years despite stellar minor-league statistics, is doing everything it takes to become a member of the Los Angeles Dodgers.

Hubbard, 31, has played the outfield each of the past three seasons, but is fielding ground balls at all four infield positions this spring. He is also a potential emergency catcher after playing that position in the minors.

"Guys like him are invaluable, when you can play infield and the outfield and be a third-string catcher if necessary," Dodgers manager Bill Russell said.

The infield positions aren't new to Hubbard. He played second base, shortstop, third base and catcher with the Houston Astros organization from 1986 to 1992.

Hubbard is eager to find a permanent home in the major leagues after batting at least .310 in Triple-A each of the past six seasons. He has spent portions of the last four years in the majors with Colorado, San Francisco and Cleveland, but he still has only 184 career at-bats.

"It's been very difficult," said Hubbard, who has a major-league career average of .255. "You really have to be focused because of the distraction in moving from here to there. I've been fortunate to be around a lot of positive people who have allowed me to stay positive and continue to do well."

Hubbard said he received several offers as a free agent last year, but picked the Dodgers because they offered the best package.

"The Dodgers stepped up to the plate," he said. "The others were on deck."

But the Dodgers also acquired Thomas Howard and Mike Devereaux – a pair of veteran outfielders with more major-league expe-

Knight pumps up to fill Celtic shoes

BASKETBALL: Ex-Laker strives to be better center, record less bench time

Minor-league veteran hopes for spot in Dodgers' lineup

UCLA battle against Titans still on, following rain delay

BASEBALL: Team hopes extra practice will cure recent sloppy infield play

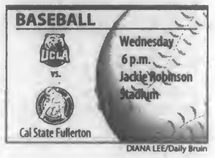
By Kristina Wilcox
Daily Bruin Staff

Because of the soggy condition of the outfield at Jackie Robinson Stadium, Tuesday's UCLA baseball game against Cal State Fullerton has been rescheduled for tonight at 6.

Still scheduled to pitch for the Bruins are sophomore Gabe Crecion (1-0, 11.12 ERA) and freshman Ryan Carter (1-0, 2.08 ERA).

Senior Erasmo Ramirez (1-2, 3.03 ERA) is likely to start on the mound for the Titans. He beat UCLA (7-7) in the Bruins' last regular-season game of 1997 while Ramirez was a member of the Cal State Northridge team.

Upon hearing that the program was canned after the 1997 season, Ramirez transferred to Fullerton.



DIANA LEE/Daily Bruin

"They're probably saving their best pitcher for us," head coach Gary Adams said.

Rightfielder Eric Byrnes became UCLA's all-time hits leader on Sunday with his sixth-inning single against the Cardinal. He now has 267 hits in his career, surpassing Tory Lovullo's previous record.

• • •

Stanford's John Gall was named Pac-10 Player of the Week after hitting for the cycle in Saturday's 23-4 victory over the Bruins.

Errors have been a real thorn in the side of the UCLA squad. In 14 games, the team has made 38 errors, leading to 41 unearned runs. That averages out to 2.93 runs per game.

The infield played especially poor defense over the weekend, forcing Adams to create a practice session for them on Monday, in the rain. Monday is normally the team's off-day.

Trivia

1. Who is the oldest pitcher to record a no-hitter in the major leagues?
2. There are five ways to have been enshrined in Baseball's Hall of Fame without playing major league baseball. What are they?
3. Why is the distance from the pitcher's mound to the plate 60 feet, 6 inches?

Answers

1. Nolan Ryan
2. In addition to players, the Hall of Fame has also enshrined executives, managers, broadcasters, managers and players from the Negro Leagues.
3. When major league baseball codified its rules in the late 1850's, the distance was 45 feet. However, when copies of the rules were being typeset and printed, a typesetter altered 60'0" as 60'6" and the distance has stayed the same ever since.

Substitutes see more time

At the match against Cal State San Bernadino last weekend, the few fans in attendance may have gotten a preview of the future. UCLA head coach Al Scates substituted almost his entire second team into the match.

Amongst those who received playing time were setter Eric Valleyly, outside hitter Matt Davis and middle blockers Danny Farmer and Seth Burnham. Back row specialist Charlie Jackson even saw action as an outside hitter in game three.

"Matt (Davis) looked real comfortable in there," Scates said. "He hit good. He passed great. He made a few serving errors but I really liked his hitting and passing. He didn't get any blocks but he put up a solid block. It was good to see him come out and play with confidence. And I won't hesitate to use him again."

During Friday night's game against the Coyotes, Davis hammered three kills in four attempts for a .750 attack percentage. He also added two aces and one dig. In limited time against Northridge, the sophomore outside hitter posted similar numbers with four kills and three digs.

Although Burnham played well against the Coyotes, it is unlikely that the 6-foot-7-inch quick-hitter will receive much more playing time.

"Seth Burnham has been looking real good in practice," Scates said. "He looked good against Santa Barbara but I don't need four middle blockers. I need four outside hitters. Right now I'm substituting more at the outside hitting position. (Adam) Naeve and (Tom) Stillwell are playing real well right now, so I only need Danny Farmer."

As usual, Farmer continues to put up the big numbers when called into action. In two games of play, the dual-sport athlete spiked 10 kills in 12 attempts for a whopping .667 attack percentage.

The depth of the Bruin bench has given Scates much flexibility against opponents. But it isn't only the coach who believes in the second-stringers. The starters are confident as well of their teammates' abilities.

"One through 12, this bunch is so strong," UCLA's senior captain Stillwell said. "We have so many different combinations, just so many things to throw at other teams, and whoever we have out there, I think we can win."

UCLA still on top despite statistics

The UCLA men's volleyball team may have an undefeated record so far this season, but that is the only statistical category that the Bruins lead. It may be surprising to note that not a single Bruin is a stat leader.

"If you look at the stats, we're way down in everything, except winning," Scates said with a chuckle.

It's true. Traditionally a leader in blocking, the Bruins rank tenth

CAPITALISM: Tradition trampled as Disney keeps cropping up everywhere

Jared Hummel

I can recall with fond memories when Disney meant something good – beyond good.

As a kid, good meant sleeping over at a friend's house and eating pizza. Disney somehow eclipsed that definition of good by a long shot.

I mean Disneyland is the "Happiest Place on Earth." To a child, this is completely accurate.

Riding on Space Mountain, the Matterhorn and Pirates of the Caribbean was about the most wonderful thing I could think of.

But just as with Santa Claus, the Easter Bunny and the Tooth Fairy, as you grow older you learn to see the strings and you realize that magic isn't really magic after all.

Now that I'm a big boy, I have learned that Disney is bad – beyond bad.

Disney, of course, hasn't changed, but as I alluded to before, I'm just more aware of what is happening behind the scenes.

As I've heard, Disney was once relatively small. A guy named Walt initially put together a cartoon, expanded by building a theme park and suddenly, posthumously created a company of behemoth proportions.

If you are now wondering what this random configuration of insignificant babble is doing in the sports section, I'll tell you.

(Note: The rest of the way I'll refer to Disney as Mickey for intimacy purposes.)

Along the course of Mickey's bingeing of American consumerism (i.e., his conquest of the world), he decided to dip his little round nose into sports.

A few miles down the Interstate Highway 5 from Disneyland, with a quick transition onto the 57 Freeway, Mickey created an arena to house his new expansion hockey team named after his "highly successful" film "The Mighty Ducks."

Mickey made his maiden voyage

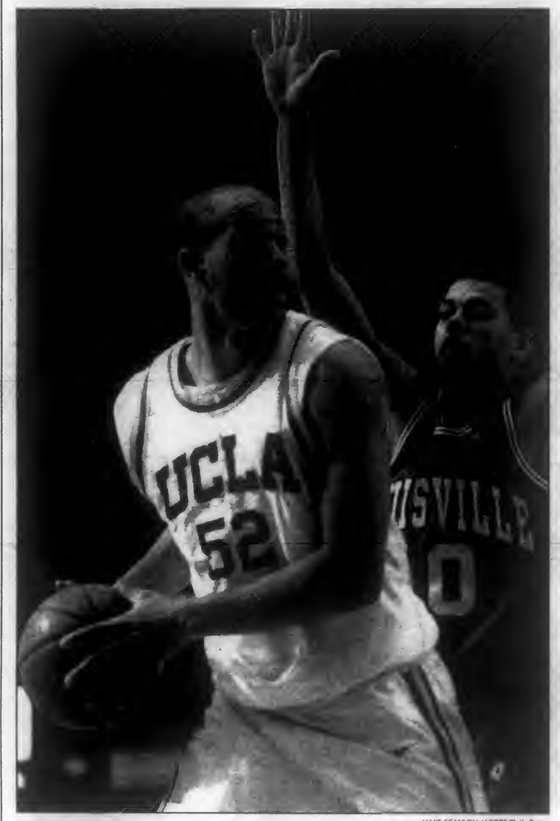
Recruits brighten Bruins' future

M. BASKETBALL: Immediate path for UCLA filled with questions, but next season brings promise

By Brent Boyd and Emmanuelle Ejercito
Daily Bruin Senior Staff

Next year's Bruin squad will be a fountain of talented youth, especially with the potential to have 12 players who will either be sophomores or freshmen.



JAMIE SCANLON-JACOBS/Daily Bruin

Senior J.R. Henderson will leave a hole to fill for next year's promising recruiting class.

UCLA already has three recruits lined up for next year's campaign, with Kansas City prep standout and McDonald's All-American JaRon Rush announcing his intention to sign with UCLA.

The Pembroke Hill senior was the object of desire for many of the nation's top programs. He was pursued especially hard by the University of Kansas. He had announced in November his intention of signing with the Jayhawks, but his mother, Glenda Rush, would not give her consent, wanting instead for Rush to think thoroughly about his decision.

Kansas stopped recruiting the 6-foot-7-inch Rush two weeks ago, when Rush criticized Kansas head coach Roy Williams' substitution techniques.

"UCLA always has had the tradition with guys like Kareem (Abdul-Jabbar) and Pooh Richardson," Rush told the Kansas City Star. "I remember being out there and looking at the championship trophies ... All my friends wanted me to go to KU so they could see me play. This will give me a chance to go away and grow up."

Another bonus for Rush's arrival in Westwood is that his close friend, Kansas City native Earl Watson, is the starting guard for the Bruins.

When Rush officially signs with UCLA, he will join two other recruits of the 1998-1999 recruiting class.

Ray Young committed to UCLA during the early signing period. The 6-foot-4-inch Young was rated the No. 1 prep off-guard in the nation by Dick Vitale's preseason magazine.

The 6-foot-7-inch Matt Barnes also signed during the early signing period. The Del Campo senior is considered to be one of the top forward prospects in California.

UCLA has six scholarships available for next year.

"Pleased would be a huge understatement," Lavin said about the prospective recruits, though he could not comment on specific potential recruits. "The four or five players that have basically told us that they are going to come (to UCLA) are at the highest level – four McDonald's All-Americans.

"Recruiting is at a high point in the seven years I've been here. In terms of the future of our program, this is exciting."

Jelani McCoy's departure left the 6-foot-8-inch J.R. Henderson as the No. 18 Bruins' tallest player and forced him to move over to center.

So, when Henderson picked up three fouls within the first six minutes against Duke, then fouled out early, the Bruins were even more undersized than before.

As a result, the Blue Devils scored early and often in their 120-84 victory.

The problem which may come as a surprise to some, UCLA head coach Steve Lavin says, is that Henderson was just too aggressive.

"You can't ask your center who is your rebounder and post offense to not be aggressive," Lavin said. "He has two weeks to learn how to be aggressive and not foul."

...

With the NCAA tournament rapidly approaching, much talk has been centered around regional seedings.

Will they be a three, four, five or six seed?

Will they be in the Midwest, East or South?

Lavin, for one, could care less.

"Right now, the seeding is less important than just playing good basketball," he said.

In the last two years, despite winning the Pac-10, the Bruins were shipped out of the West – last

Pac-10 Championships bring excitement to UCLA squad

SWIMMING: Well-prepared for important meet, team hopes to qualify for NCAAs with best times of season

By Steve Kim
Daily Bruin Staff

UCLA women's swimming head coach Cyndi Gallagher has said time and again that the team peaks toward the Pac-10s and the NCAAs. One of these championships has finally arrived. This year's Pac-10 Championships will be hosted by UCLA at the Long Beach indoor pool facility Thursday through Saturday.

Unlike the regular season's one-day, dual meets, these swimming championships occur over three days. This allows the swimmers to rest more between races; consequently, many swim their fastest times of the season.

Albert Carnesale searching for a No. 2 man

ADMINISTRATION: UC person sought to be new executive vice chancellor

By Lawrence Ferchaw
Daily Bruin Contributor

For Chancellor Albert Carnesale, the search process is familiar. Only this time, he is the one asking the questions.

Almost one year after Carnesale was selected to be chancellor by the UC Board of Regents, he is looking for a second in command to replace Executive Vice Chancellor Charles Kennel when he leaves this spring.

At this time, the committee has a list of eight candidates, said Graduate Students' Association President Andrew Westall, a member of the committee. The committee is still seeking candidates from other UC campuses.

Experience in the UC system is one qualification which Carnesale has established for the position. Because the chancellor is new to the UC system, "he wants someone to complement him," said Elizabeth Neufeld, professor of biological chemistry and a member of the committee.

Though the chancellor has limited the search to candidates with UC experience, he is not limiting it to candidates from UCLA.

The position is important to the university and for that reason Carnesale said he is "very much engaged in the search on a regular basis."

To help him with his decision, the chancellor has created a committee composed of faculty members representing all areas of campus, administrators and student leaders.

The committee will advise Carnesale and give him feedback on candidates to help him make his decision, but the decision is his alone. The chancellor plans to make the selection by April.

The executive vice chancellor is the second in charge at UCLA. He or she is responsible for the daily operations of the campus as well as communicating with the Academic Senate. He or she also works closely with the chancellor to create and carry out policies.

The executive vice chancellor "will have primary responsibility for the academic programs," said Kennel who has held the position since 1996. He is leaving to become director of Scripps Institute of Oceanography at UC San Diego.

The position of executive vice chancellor has recently assumed more duties, as the position of vice chancellor of academic planning and budget was removed and all academic planning responsibilities were given to the executive vice chancellor.

Beyond UCLA, Kennel said that the executive vice chancellor meets to discuss systemwide academic issues with the academic vice chancellors from the other University of

UCLA students unsure of U.S. motives in Iraq

WAR: Many say civilian welfare, not economics, should be top concern

By Catherine Turner
Daily Bruin Contributor

Though over 5,000 miles away from the Iraqi crisis, UCLA students have expressed concern and anger toward the position of the United States and welfare of the Iraqi people.

Specifically, some students are unsure of the motives of the United States, the well-being of the Iraqi people and American soldiers and the future actions of Saddam Hussein, the United States and the United Nations.

The Muslim Student Association (MSA) is one organization currently demonstrating its concerns that the Iraqi people are uneducated, unfed and dying without action from any nation with the power to change things.

"The Iraqi people have nowhere to turn," said Shaan Sethi, a first-year business economics student, who believes that the people are caught in the middle of Hussein's greed for national power and the rest of the world's desire to impede it.

An agreement made about weapons inspections reached by U.N. Chief Kofi Annan and Hussein is still awaiting approval from the United States. Although the agreement has quieted the United States' threat of bombing, it has not completely resolved the situation.

"I am happy the agreement took place, but I am still cynical that bombing will not occur," said Ahmed Shama, editor for the Muslim newsmagazine Al-Talib.

Madeleine Albright of the Clinton Administration said, "It is possible that (Annan) will come up with something we don't like, in which case we will pursue our national interest," as reported by the Los Angeles Times.

The United States previously put sanctions on the importation of items such as medicine and food into Iraq in order to pressure Hussein to comply to unlimited weapons inspections.

These sanctions have been unsuccessful, but the United States has not moved to end them.

"Saddam Hussein is not feeling any of the effects of the sanctions; he has numerous homes and money. The Iraqi people are suffering," said Salar Rizvi, MSA director of programs.

The implementation of troops into Iraq has also caused harm to both the soldiers and innocent people.

"Babies are being born with defects and soldiers are suffering from memory loss and genetic mutation from exposure to the defective uranium found in U.S. bullets," said Rizvi said.

MSA has protested the U.S. policy, claiming that it is inhumane and purposeless, and has even referred to it as "genocidal." In response to concerns like these, Albright said that the Clinton administration's policy of military aggression is to ensure "that (Americans) can sleep at night."

Students unaffiliated with the MSA also raised interest in the Iraqi crisis.

Many students at UCLA are against bombing Iraq.

"With such strong world opposition to military action against Iraq, anything less than all-out defiance by Saddam Hussein will probably be tolerated," said Doug Kolozsvari, a third-year sociology student.

Other students feel that innocent casualties are just part of the natural causes of war and conflict and cannot be avoided.

"National warfare is unbiased in its killing and sometimes innocent people get hurt," said Samira Kapadia, a first-year undeclared student.

Some students feel that the U.S.' policy is equally as tyrannical as Hussein's actions and has been motivated by economic pursuit rather than the welfare and basic needs of humanity.

"The U.S. government will not kill

Early exposure to college hopes to improve attitudes toward education

By J. Sharon Yee
Daily Bruin Contributor

"UCLA should pick me for a student because I will be good," Joseph Tecson wrote in his personal statement. "I always write nicely on my homework and try not to get a mistake."

If this sounds different from what you wrote on your application for admission, keep in mind Joseph is only 7 years old.

In an attempt to expose young children to college, second-grade students at Edison Elementary School in Glendale were given the opportunity to "apply" for admission to the university.

"A great thing I have done in school is a math test," wrote Andres Galaviz, reflecting on an academic achievement that made him stronger.

Wednesday, Joseph and Andres' class got its first taste of collegiate life, complete with a campus tour and lunch at the Graduate School of Education & Information Studies (GSE&IS).

"It was fun!" said Krystal Abagon, a first-grader whose favorite subject is reading.

The class of first, second and third-graders, most of whose parents did not attend college, represent the youngest group of prospective students to ever take a campus tour.

After the tour, the six students who wrote personal essays were presented with "acceptance" letters from Rae Jeane Williams, director of professional development contracts at Center X, a research institute functioning out of

Berkeley digitizes past documents of the West

The history of the American West will soon be available on a computer screen.

Documents at UC Berkeley's Phoebe Apperson Hearst Museum of Anthropology, which are frail and crumbling, will be digitized to save them for the future. A $23,000 grant from the National Center for Preservation Technology and Training will fund the project.

Now, instead of handling the fragile documents, researchers will see them on a computer screen or on printouts that may be easier to use than the original.

"Many of these are newspaper clippings, typed manuscripts and other documents collected in the early 20th century. There are pencil sketches that can smudge, and the photos sometimes have no negatives," said Rosemary Joyce, the museum director.

Researchers visit the museum to view the documents which range from Native American studies and history to ethnobotany.

"In some cases, these are the only remaining records of the communities that flourished prior to contact with other peoples," said Joyce.

Included in the records are field reports from a Depression-era anthropological survey of Orange County funded by the Federal Works Progress Administration.

The National Center for Preservation Technology and Training is a division of the National Park Service which focuses on technical issues in the preservation of cultural resources.

Faculty library opens doors to undergrads

The UCLA Law School just opened up its faculty library to third-year students. Because of the delays in the construction of the new law library, administrators decided to open up the smaller facility to students who would not have access to the new library.

The faculty library is not staffed. Third-year law students were given keys to the room, which has about 30 seats, computer terminals and copies of court case legal collections.

They may use the room during building hours, from 7 a.m. to 12 midnight every day.

American Airlines sells cheap fare to students

American Airlines has been offering college students discounts up to 65 percent on flights for spring break. Students must purchase tickets now in order to qualify for the low travel fares.

Students may book their flights on-line, through American Airlines or a travel agent. Flight prices range from $109 to $259 round trip, depending on the flight distance. Special fares only apply to flights within the United States, excluding Alaska and Hawaii. All flights require a 14-day advance purchase in order to travel between Feb. 23 and April 16.

Other specials offered to college students by American Airlines are announced via e-mail. Students who log on to the site and sign up to receive promotional announcements can win six round-trip coach tickets for themselves and five friends. The site address is www.aa.com/college.

Fowler benefits from Getty Grant Program

The UCLA Fowler Museum of Cultural History has received a $130,000 grant from the Getty Grant Program. The grant money will help fund publications about non-Western textile studies.

"Among the world's art forms, clothing traditions are one of those most intimately tied to fundamental issues of identity," Doran H. Ross, the Fowler Museum's director, said.

The Fowler Museum already publishes highly regarded scholarship on non-Western textile studies. Its collective includes more than 10,000 items from two millennia and five continents.

Stretching the limits

Heidi Moneymaker's hard work and positive attitude, both in and out of the gym, reflect her love of laughter, friends and having fun

By Trina Enriquez
Daily Bruin Contributor

It's 2:30 p.m. in Yates Gym and women's gymnastics is now in session.

Amid bursts of laughter, Heidi Moneymaker wraps her arms around her body and assumes a solemn face. She struggles to keep from grinning before tumbling through her rendition of teammate Kiralee Hayashi's floor exercise. Teammate Stella Umeh quickly joins in, and together they perform exaggerated, funky moves with the most serious of faces. Teammate Lena Degteva joins in and soon all the girls are out there.

Cut to the bright lights of Pauley Pavilion: Faces written with intensity, members of four teams, including UCLA, execute moves on each of the four gymnastics apparatuses. There's no goofing around here, as UCLA takes home another victory and the top three all-around scores, one of which belongs to Moneymaker.

Yet the camaraderie prevails as hugs, high fives and head-rufflings head around.

"Heidi is game for anything," said head coach Valorie Kondos. "She doesn't really care about making a fool of herself; she just loves life, and has a ton of energy to enjoy it!"

This boundless energy manifests itself right down to her staccato way of speaking. "I'm such a hyper person, I go into overdrive before a meet," she grins. "Usually I'm bouncing off walls."

That energy fuels what Kondos calls "One hundred percent commitment, 100 percent of the time."

Moneymaker is team captain not only because of her energy and strong work ethic, but because she cares about her teammates, who form an extended family for the second-year undeclared student.

Creativity resolves conflicts, ROTC says

PANEL: Event shows that school military organization are in sync with university's mission

By Barbara Ortutay
Daily Bruin Contributor

With its first-ever community outreach program, the UCLA ROTC is exploring aspects of conflict resolution not commonly attributed to the military.

Although men and women in uniform outnumbered civilians at the relatively sparsely attended event, this did not deter the organizers from carrying on a successful conflict resolution panel.

"There is this general sense that ROTC does its thing out there, separate from the rest of the student body, when in fact we are largely in sync with the mission of the university," said Cadet/First Lieutenant Evan Seamone, who organized Wednesday's event.

"This event has been my baby for a while," he added.

The panel was somewhat delayed because of parking problems, but around noon it began with a performance by the UCLA ROTC drill team.

"This is to get the creative juices flowing," said Seamone.

The goal of the panel was to resolve conflict creatively, through communication and understanding.

The first speaker, Carol Petersen from UCLA's conflict resolution program, spoke about affirmative action and the diversity of the UCLA student body during the 1993 protests over affirmative action.

"The strength of the presence of students was extremely important – the protests showed the diversity of the student body in a peaceful way," she said.

Following Petersen, members of the conflict resolution program performed a skit demonstrating racial conflict in a restaurant.

In the skit, two students got into an argument with a waiter over ordering a one-drink minimum, and the conflict resulted in both sides using racial slurs against each other.

"The purpose of this exercise is to show that arguments can arise from everyday situations," said Michael Megturo, also from UCLA's conflict resolution program.

"Stereotypical assumptions and words one uses can result in a conflict whether one is in a restaurant or a policy table discussing affirmative action," he continued.

Following the issue of conflict resolution within the UCLA community, the panel moved on to national, then international conflict mediation.

Speaker John J. Welsh, from the Strauss Institute for Dispute Resolution in Pepperdine, emphasized the importance of resolving conflict without going to court. He said about 80 percent of conflicts brought to organized mediation are settled, without cases going to court.

"Especially in California, mediation has

High-tech companies want cap on work visas raised

TECHNOLOGY: Demand for computer engineers outstrips domestic supply

By Warren Wilson
Seattle Post-Intelligencer

High-tech companies facing a severe shortage of computer engineers and programmers want Congress to raise the cap on foreign professionals who enter the country each year on work visas.

Demand for computer professionals is so far outstripping the supply that companies say they are having to postpone or cancel whole projects. Some say they may have to move projects overseas to find the expertise they need, because postponement would mean losing the business to a foreign competitor.

"It's not a threat, it's a reality," said Brian Raymond, domestic policy manager for the American Electronics Association in Washington, D.C.

If companies can't find the workers they need in the United States, "they'll go to where the workers are and start setting up shop around (them) – PhDs, senior engineers, etc," Raymond said.

The topic is on Washington Sen. Slade Gorton's agenda Thursday when he meets with technology leaders at Microsoft Corp. in Redmond. Microsoft, Texas Instruments and Sun Microsystems are among the companies scheduled to testify about the worker shortage at a U.S. Senate subcommittee hearing next week.

One focus of the Feb. 25 hearing chaired by Sen. Spencer Abraham, R-Mich., will be a visa category known as H1B that limits the number of non-U.S. citizens who may enter the country each year to work in "specialty occupations."

Created by the Immigration Reform act of 1990, the H1B category covers a wide range of professions, including accountants, doctors, professors and architects as well as computer engineers and programmers, with a cap set at 65,000 a year. Employers apply to the Immigration and Naturalization Service for H1B status for non-citizens they want to hire. The visa is good for six years; many recipients obtain permanent-resident status before the H1B expires.

> American universities aren't turning out nearly enough computer experts to fill the demand.

For the first several years, demand for H1B visas remained below the ceiling. But last year, the cap was reached on Sept. 5, a month before the end of the federal fiscal year. With demand continuing to spiral upward, observers expect the cap will be reached this fiscal year in May or June, and next year just a month or two after it starts.

The effect is immediate on companies that rely on high-tech professionals.

"Several times a year you're going to have a very senior, crucial new hire, for a new technology or a new businesss, who can only become an employee under the H1B visa category," said an attorney for one major employer.

Once the cap is reached, he said, "You simply have to wait."

Crisis isn't too strong a term, Raymond said.

"In terms of workforce and human-resources policy issues, (the H1B visa program) is our top priority," he said.

The situation has several causes, starting with the high-tech revolution that is causing demand for computer experts to skyrocket, not just among the white-hot growth companies such as Intel and Microsoft (which by itself has about 2,000 current vacancies) but in all types of industries as they become increasingly reliant on computer technology.

Demand has so far outpaced supply that U.S. companies with 100 or more employees currently have 346,000 vacancies for programmers, system analysts and computer scientists/engineers, according to a recent study by the Information Technology Association of America and the Virginia Polytechnic Institute.

The U.S. Department of Commerce estimates that the nation will need more than a million new information-technology professionals between 1996 and 2006. The greatest need will be for systems analysts, it said, where employment is expected to grow from 506,000 in 1996 to 1,025,000 in 2006 – a 103 percent jump, compared to 14 percent for all occupations.

American universities aren't turning out nearly enough computer experts to fill the demand, though there are signs the number of graduates will grow.

The Commerce Department cited a recent survey by the Computing Research Association that said bachelor-level enrollment in U.S. schools that grant doctorates in computer science and computer engineering were up 46 percent in 1996.

> "We're doing things to help educate American workers, but we have a shortage that needs to be filled."
> Debra Cabral
> American Business for Legal Immigration spokeswoman

But a substantial share of the graduates are non-U.S. citizens who must obtain H1B visas before they can work for a U.S. company, no matter what their professional skills.

National Science Foundation data from 1995, the most recent year available, show that 32 percent of all graduate students in computer science were non-U.S. citizens, said Raymond of the American Electronics Association.

In electrical engineering, the figure was even higher, he said: 36 percent of all graduate students were non-U.S. citizens.

"Who do we hire," Raymond said, "if that's what our universities are producing?"

The long-term solution, he and others agree, is to counter the "nerd" stereotype that plagues the computer industry, extol the rewards it can offer and try to interest young students in the math and science courses that will prepare them for careers in the field.

Another tool is to retrain engineers from fields such as defense that are more static or even shrinking. But those are long-term efforts, and the shortage of high-tech professionals is already so severe that many American companies are joining the push to raise or abolish the H1B cap.

One organization, called American Business for Legal Immigration, represents more than 200 corporations and trade associations who have banded together to pursue that goal.

"We're doing things to help educate American workers," spokeswoman Debra Cabral said, "but we have a shortage that needs to be filled in the short term."

Organizations that want the H1B restrictions left alone include the Institute of Electrical and Electronics Engineers of America, whose president-elect is Seattle-based computer consultant Paul Kostek.

IEEE members well remember cases in which companies laid off groups of employees and replaced them with immigrants holding H1B visas – "often for less money, and on a contract basis so they weren't offered benefits," Kostek said.

He acknowledged the strong demand for computer scientists and programmers, but added, "We still see layoffs taking place, through

Senate braces for reform battle

CONGRESS: Campaign finance legislation foes, proponents engage in fight on political funding

By David Espo
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON – Opponents of campaign finance legislation are digging in their heels in the Senate, determined to kill a measure that finally has the support of a narrow majority of lawmakers.

"This bill is not going to pass. Not today, not tomorrow," Sen. Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., said on Tuesday, shortly after the legislation had cleared its first hurdle. The measure survived on a test vote of 51-48, a narrow majority but well short of the 60 votes that will be needed to overcome a filibuster led by its Republican foes.

The next test is likely to come late Thursday, on a proposal crafted by Maine Republican Sen. Olympia Snowe designed to curtail union spending and attack ads in political campaigns.

"We should be putting our heads together, not building walls between us with intractable rhetoric and all-or-nothing provisions," Snowe said Tuesday evening as she appealed for support from GOP critics of her proposal.

The campaign finance legislation, developed by Sens. John McCain, R-Ariz., and Russell Feingold, D-Wis., would ban unregulated "soft money" that flows to national political parties from corporations, labor unions and individuals. It also would impose fresh curbs on advertisements that attack candidates but escape regulation because they are presented as "issue ads" not covered by existing election law.

Within moments of the roll call on Tuesday, Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott exercised his prerogative to slow the bill's passage – much as he did last fall when the measure was last on the floor.

"Here we go again," lamented Senate Minority Leader Tom Daschle, D-S.D. "What is it about the majority filibustering something a majority of the Senate favors?"

While the maneuvering unfolded on the Senate floor, Democrats labored for political advantage.

President Clinton – whose 1996 campaign fund raising has spawned congressional investigations and criminal indictments – issued a statement saying that "only the obstruction of a minority stands in the way of a law that would strengthen our democracy."

McConnell and other Republican opponents charge the measure, which would impose limits on certain types of campaign spending, is a violation of the First Amendment guarantee of free speech.

The Kentucky Republican argued that money has played a role in politics since before the birth of the nation. "When anonymous pamphlets were passed out supporting the Revolution, somebody paid for those," he said.

Computer hackers target U.S. Defense Department

PENTAGON: Officials say attacks ought to serve as wake-up call to everyone

By Susanne M. Schafer
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON – Over the past two weeks, the Pentagon's unclassified computer networks were hit by the "most organized and systematic" attack yet, apparently by hackers bent on peering into personnel records or payroll matters, the Defense Department said Wednesday.

No classified information appears to have been tampered with, but the matter remains "a very serious, long-term problem," said Deputy Defense Secretary John Hamre.

"We have organized ourselves much more aggressively and more closely with the Justice Department to get our hands around this," he added.

Hamre said he couldn't divulge too many details about the attacks because the military was working with Justice in pursuing potential criminal activity.

Hamre told a group of defense writers the onslaught should serve as a "wake-up call" for the military in particular and society overall, arguing that neither the government nor

NEW ZEALAND: Unabated growth lead to blackout; citizens blame leadership

By Peter James Spielmann
The Associated Press

AUCKLAND, New Zealand – The only hum and throb in downtown Auckland these days is the sound of diesel generators battling the blackout. The only bustle is fuel trucks refilling them.

Otherwise the streets of New Zealand's largest city are nearly deserted, its shops and offices shuttered by a power failure now in Day 6 – and counting.

Indoors, New Zealanders fumble in the dark, drag themselves up the stairs of high-rises whose elevators are idled, turn up their noses at heat-soured milk – and blame the city officials who let growth outstrip the overworked electric company's ability to keep up.

"Its been very busy," said one diesel trucker, Ron Nolan, as he ran a

President Fidel Castro re-elected to fifth term

MEXICO CITY – Elected to a fifth term as president, Fidel Castro vowed socialism in Cuba will outlive him and denounced a U.S. aid proposal for the island.

Castro's seven-hour speech to the opening of a new session of parliament ended shortly after midnight Wednesday – its marathon length reminiscent of his speeches in the early years after his 1959 revolution.

The 601-member parliament, elected in January, opened its five-year term Tuesday by re-electing Castro and other top members of the Council of State, which works in conjunction with the Cabinet. Castro was the only presidential candidate, and all the deputies were elected unchallenged.

In his wide-ranging speech, Castro, 71, declared Cuba's single-party communist system "untouchable" and said those who predict a "post-Castro transformation" are wrong.

Castro also denounced a proposal before the U.S. Congress to distribute limited aid through U.S. charitable organization as "humiliating."

He ridiculed those who feel easing the U.S. embargo of Cuba would help topple socialism by bringing greater contact with Americans.

Castro has been Cuba's unchallenged leader since 1959, even though he was only elected president in 1976.

Five arrested for killing rare pandas, monkeys

BEIJING – Chinese police have arrested five people suspected of killing giant pandas and golden monkeys, rare animals whose killers can face the death penalty.

Police in southern China's Hunan province confiscated five golden monkey pelts from two men from northern Gansu province who were arrested Feb. 6, the state-run Xinhua news agency said Wednesday.

Another five golden monkey pelts and two panda pelts were found in a farmer's home. Members of the farmer's family confessed to killing 10 golden monkeys and two pandas, Xinhua said.

China has no more than 1,000 pandas left in the wild and only several thousand golden monkeys, Xinhua said.

Coin honors African American patriots

WASHINGTON – A silver coin commemorating the 5,000 African Americans who fought in the Revolutionary War was offered for sale Wednesday to help finance a new memorial to African American patriots on the National Mall.

The dollar coin features escaped slave Crispus Attucks on one side and an African American colonial family on the other. A total 500,000 coins will be minted and sold by the U.S. Mint at prices beginning at $30 each.

In a ceremony at the National Archives, Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin said that it is fitting that the coin honors Attucks, who was the first person killed by British soldiers during the Boston Massacre on March 5, 1770. The event is credited as one of the flashpoints that led to the revolution.

Under the terms of legislation passed by Congress, a foundation organized to build a Black Patriots Memorial on the Mall would receive $10 from each coin sold, up to a total of $5 million. The money would become available only if the foundation raises an equal amount from private donations.

If sufficient money is raised, the memorial would be built near the lake between the Lincoln Memorial and the Washington Monument. The memorial would feature a 90-foot-long bronze sculpture by artist Ed Dwight depicting the role of African American soldiers and families in the Revolutionary War.

Ads seek to combat statutory rape

CAMPAIGN: Proponents hope to protect young girls from pregnancies

The Associated Press

SAN FRANCISCO – The billboards show a forlorn young man sitting in his prison cell with the words, "Sex with a minor is a major crime."

The unusual ad is one aspect of a new statewide campaign to crack down on statutory rape.

As part of Gov. Pete Wilson's Partnership for Responsible Parenting Initiative, the California Department of Health Services recently started the multimillion dollar radio and print campaign, which includes billboards and bus placards.

The prevention and prosecution of statutory rape has received renewed attention in recent years, with authorities aggressively prosecuting adults 18 years or older who have sex with minors, specifically when the age difference is five years or more.

In the past 21 months, 1,298 adults have been convicted in California of having sex with minors, according to the state's Office of Criminal Justice Planning.

For the past three years, Wilson has allotted $8 million to prosecute

1996~97 ASUCLA Financial Statements

In keeping with our desire to provide regular and open communications with the community we serve, ASUCLA is publishing a summary of its audited financial statements.

ASUCLA is a non-profit association organized in 1919 with the primary goals of serving the campus community and providing students with on-campus employment. There are four distinct financial entities within ASUCLA. Services & Enterprises, the biggest from a financial standpoint, is the entity which operates campus services such as the UCLA Store and Restaurants and the Student Union facilities. The two student governments are also treated as separate entities: USA is the Undergraduate Students Association, and GSA is the Graduate Students Association. Finally there's the Communications Board, publisher of the Daily Bruin and other Campus Media. The two student governments receive the bulk of their income from student membership fees; they are expected to operate at break-even. Services & Enterprises receives its income from the sale of goods and services, while Communications Board receives its income principally from advertising.

ASUCLA's Board of Directors is responsible for the fiscal soundness of all four ASUCLA entities. Each entity operates under its own budget, and all four budgets are reviewed and approved by the Board of Directors. The names of current Board members are listed at right.

Financial Statements for the year ended July 31, 1997 have been examined by an independent audit firm, Deloitte & Touche LLP. The results of that examination are covered in the Deloitte & Touche LLP reports to the ASUCLA Board of Directors. You will see summaries of these reports reproduced on the following page.

If you would like to see the full details of these reports including all footnotes you can find the financial statements in the ASUCLA library archives located in Kerckhoff Hall 304-D. Any other questions about the financial statements should be directed to ASUCLA's Finance Department. Feel free to call, write or e-mail the ASUCLA Finance Director, Rich Delia, at (310) 794-8834, 308 Westwood Plaza, Los Angeles, CA 90024, Campus Mail Code 164006, or rdelia@asucla.ucla.edu. BLACKOUT greasy finger down a ledger and tallied 150 fuel stops in the past 24 hours.

Downtown Auckland is almost a ghost town, the victim of a self-inflicted disaster – all four underground power cables supplying electricity to downtown from a hydroelectric plant south of the city have been out of order since Friday.

This city of 1 million people has grown for years – but growth has outstripped infrastructure. When the strained cables started failing, power company Mercury Energy had no backup system. The first cable failed on Jan. 22, the second on Feb. 9, the third and fourth on Feb. 19 and 20.

The company's aging cables were stressed in a recent heat wave. Mercury's energy director John Collinge also said the company had recently halved its work force.

"All these factors don't say that maintenance was at fault, but they point very strongly to that," Collinge said.

Partial service may be restored Monday – with rolling blackouts in downtown neighborhoods – if one cable is fixed. But full service isn't expected until March 9 or later, company spokesman Richard Gibbons said.

The government has ordered an investigation.

Residents and businesses are struggling in the meantime.

In harborside office buildings – where generators are providing partial power – barefoot employees in short sleeves swelter as the sun blasts through windows that don't open. Generators are too weak to power air conditioners or more than one elevator at a time.

"We're lucky. At least we've got jobs," said Kate, a worker at Alan Smythe Special Events, in a harborfront office building. "My friend who works at a bar in Queen Street just lost her job. The beer is warm and the ice has melted."

About half the small businesses, bars and restaurants downtown are closed. Many of bigger businesses have removed files and computer disks and relocated to suburban branch offices or to the capital, Wellington.

American Express sent nine of its 18 employees to Wellington this week and plans to send more. In the central library, bibliophiles groped through the darkness or used flashlights loaned to them by librarians to find books until frustration forced it to close Wednesday.

Hamish Haldine, who lives on the 14th floor of a building without power for elevators, said even a simple shopping trip for milk was a nightmare.

> A contingency plan has been prepared to evacuate ... downtown if the situation gets worse.

"The staircase is hot, enclosed and has no ventilation," he said.

About 10 percent of the normal downtown power supply is getting through on a backup cable – and it is reserved for emergency services such as hospitals.

When the blackout first hit on Friday night, Auckland Hospital was plunged into darkness while surgery was underway in three operating theaters. Dr. David Sage, director of the operation rooms, said it took up to 25 minutes for the hospital's generator to restore power. No one was hurt.

Most of downtown business which had meat, milk or other perishables have dumped them or sent it to other locations before they spoiled.

City officials told residents at a public meeting Wednesday that a contingency plan has been prepared to evacuate the about 6,000 people who live downtown if the situation gets worse.

"We have had people trapped in elevators, overcome by fumes, there have been fires," Mayor Les Mills told the crowd. "People have been hurt."

No injuries have been serious.

The issue, he added, is: "Do we think we have too much political discourse in this country? I would argue that we don't have any problems relating to too much political discourse."

Beyond their stated constitutional objections, according to several Republican aides who spoke on condition of anonymity, GOP leaders have concluded there is little public support for the measure. As a result, these aides added, Republicans see little political risk in blocking a measure that many of them believe would disadvantage GOP candidates in future elections.

Republicans have countered with a proposal would allow union members to stop the use of their dues money for political activity. GOP supporters call this proposal "paycheck protection," but Democrats counter it is a "poison pill" designed to kill chances for campaign finance overhaul.

Snowe's proposal is designed in part as an alternative and Democrats embraced it on Tuesday.

Under her proposal, unions would be barred from using dues money, and corporations would be barred from using their own funds to pay for loosely regulated "issue advertisements" that are used to attack candidates within 60 days of an election. Other organizations would be permitted to air such ads, subject to speedy disclosure.

While that would impose tougher restrictions on unions than the McCain-Feingold legislation, it would be far less onerous than the measure advanced by most Republicans.

Clinton announced his support for Snowe's proposal, and Democratic senators gave it their support after organized labor signaled its acquiescence, according to one lawmaker, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

ATTACK

the private sector has done enough to protect sensitive networks from such attacks.

He described the intrusions as "fairly heavy cyber attacks" over the past two weeks. It had "all the appearances of a game" and apparently was perpetrated by "a small number of individuals," he said.

"It was the most organized and systematic attack the Pentagon has seen to date," he said.

Hamre said the attacks appeared to be occurring at a time when a "hacker contest" was going on, but he did not say where the contest originated from or offer any further explanation.

He said the attacks did not appear to be connected with the crisis involving Iraq.

The intrusions were directed at such information as personnel records and payroll matters, he said, adding, "Our classified networks were intact and not penetrated."

Hamre described the attacks as

"widespread and modestly sophisticated." Attempts were made to enter networks used by all the military service branches, and the strikes occurred at networks located "across the country," he said.

It isn't clear where the attacks originated from, or how many individuals were involved, he said.

Hamre said the character of the intrusions had "the quality of voyeurism or vandalism."

"There are hackers that enjoy breaking into peoples' computers, just to see what they can see," he said, adding that the Defense Department appears to hold some "mystique" for hackers.

The individuals appeared to be trying to leave "trap doors" in the systems, Hamre said.

Also called back doors, trap doors refer to mechanisms hackers leave behind after they've broken in. They might break in, look around, cover their tracks, and exit, leaving the digital equivalent of a "key under the welcome mat" to use next time.

Hamre said the Pentagon has been attempting in recent years to update its defenses against such attacks, but added, "We have to do a good deal more in this area."

The trade publication Defense Information and Electronics Report on Feb. 13 reported that attacks had been detected during the previous week at 11 military bases – seven Air Force sites and four Navy installations. The report said they were Andrews Air Force Base, Md.; Columbus Air Force Base, Miss.; Lackland and Kelly Air Force Bases in Texas; Gunter Annex, Ala.; Kirtland Air Force Base, N.M.; and an Air National Guard facility in Channel Islands, Calif. The Navy sites were Pearl Harbor, Hawaii; the Naval Academy and two Marine Corps systems in Okinawa, Japan.

The report also quoted Tony Valleita, the acting assistant secretary of defense for computer, communication and intelligence matters, as saying that the current defense budget allots roughly $24 billion for those matters, including $1 billion for information security.

A senior military official who dealt with the intrusions said the attacks received high-priority attention because it is difficult to differentiate whether an attack is by a nation-state, an individual or someone working on behalf of another nation.

Asked whether the attacks had stopped, the official said he could not disclose the answer. He said Pentagon officials suspect the Pentagon was not the only institution under attack and that networks in the private sector also may have been subject to hacking.

Last year, the General Accounting Office of Congress reported as many as 250,000 attempts may have been made to penetrate military computer networks in the previous year. It said 65 percent – or some 162,500 attempts – were successful.

REAL BRUINS

This is evident in practice two days before the meet. Fierce sit-ups, prolonged headstands, back-cracking and stretches involving unbelievable body contortions precede the rare, "Candid Camera" moment of improvising floor routines, after which each gymnast concentrates on the vault, the beam, the uneven bars or the floor exercise.

> "Heidi is the hardest working gymnast that all of us have ever seen, but she's not a Goody Two-Shoes or a kiss-up."
> Valorie Kondos
> Gymnastics head coach

In between routines though, the camaraderie comes through: Hayashi playfully kicks Moneymaker from behind, and caught off-guard, she falls over in mock pain. And when Hayashi's mother comes into the gym, several of the gymnasts greet her affectionately with hugs.

Near the end of the practice, a few gymnasts are found chatting as Moneymaker lounges cross-wise over Hayashi, who takes no notice as she lies on her stomach working on a crossword puzzle. Soon the gymnasts gather together for the cool-down, breaking into splits in unison. Afterward, Moneymaker heads out for a Friday night with her friends, two of whom are teammates.

"We get together a lot outside of practice and competition," Moneymaker said. "No team is as close as we are.

"No one was too shy when they got here and if they were, it didn't last long," she continued.

Moneymaker spends about three hours a day, five days a week in practice unless the team treks to other U.S. cities for meets. The schedule can get grueling, and Moneymaker admits that she doesn't always keep up with it.

Yet she seems to be balancing her life pretty well. She shares an apartment with three others, two of whom are Degteva and teammate Luisa Portocarrero. Between them they share one car, which at times makes for a chaotic morning when they carpool to school.

Moneymaker usually arrives on campus between 9 a.m. and 10 a.m., then heads off to class. Several gymnasts take the same courses; Moneymaker's boyfriend is in the same history lecture as she, and they meet throughout the day when possible. Because he's also a gymnast, she says, he understands her schedule.

This includes practice at 2:00 p.m., after which she has a few hours to do homework and otherwise take care of what needs to be done. In reality, however, she's usually a little too exhausted after the three-hour workout.

Moneymaker rarely has spare time, and on the occasions she does, she prefers sleeping in. Actually, she says: "Gymnastics itself gets to be my spare time. I like training, learning new things."

"Heidi is the hardest working gymnast that all of us have ever seen, but she's not a Goody Two-Shoes or a kiss-up," said Kondos. "To live that commitment is extraordinary."

Kondos adds that Moneymaker has been down the hard and easy roads maintaining her position on the team. "Her understanding of why our standards are so important has helped her communicate these things to her teammates, especially the younger classmen."

RAPE

statutory rape cases as part of his responsible parenting initiative.

The reasons for the renewed focus on the issue range from welfare reform, to concerns over teen pregnancies, to fears that more minors are being exploited.

Statutory rape laws have been on the books since 1872, but for much of that time the law was widely ignored, because society seemed to accept relationships between older men and younger girls, legal experts say.

"There are some people who think if the girl was consenting, what's the big deal?" said Santa Clara County prosecutor JoAnne McCracken.

But in 1996, University of California at Irvine researchers released a study showing that 66 percent of the babies born to underage girls in the state were fathered by adult males 19 or older.

"The numbers were very alarming," said prosecutor Nancy O'Malley, who heads up the district attorney's statutory rape unit in Alameda County. "Babies should not be having babies."

Lorie Brendal was only 15 years old when she had a child. Her live-in boyfriend, Willie Jones, was 31. When they met, Jones told Brendal he was 19.

"He said he would be with me and support me," she said. "But he wasn't even there in the hospital when my daughter was born."

Jones later pleaded guilty to statutory rape and was sent to jail for a year.

Prosecutors said that Brendal's sentence was much more harsh than Jones': her chances of finishing high school, attending college and getting a well-paying job are slight, statistics show.

O'Malley said that in Alameda County, 103 babies were born to mothers younger than 13 and fathers older than 21 from 1993 to 1996.

A law enacted this requires officials who deal with children – including doctors, nurses and teachers – to report pregnant girls 15 years or younger to police when the father of the child is 21 or older, said O'Malley, who wrote the legislation.

Most experts agree the state will have to cut teen pregnancies to reform the welfare system, but some lawyers claim that using an old law is the wrong way to go about it.

"How many people do you think are really going to be deterred by this?" said San Francisco criminal defense attorney Terry Diggs. "Come on. There will always be 30-year-old men trying to make it with 16-year-old girls. So you sit the 16-year-old down and you tell her how things are. You don't resurrect a dinosaur and put a V-8 engine in it. No, what this is is reactionary morality legislation dressed up as a solution."

Rory Little, a criminal law professor at Hastings, endorsed the recent surge in statutory rape prosecutions.

The bottom line is that it may not have been a priority in the past, but now the state has found some very compelling reasons to make it one, he said.

"If there is a good rationale to shift prosecutorial resources to a crime, then we should do it," he said.

IMMIGRANTS

reorganizations, takeover, downsizing ... We believe many of the people caught up in those situations will be available" to fill jobs in the computer industry.

They may need some additional skills, he said, but retraining them would often be a better use of the employer's time and money than seeking H1B visas status non-citizens.

"The H1B category was set up for people who have extraordinary skills," he said. "I don't think anyone is saying that people who have extra skills should be kept out. But when people say, 'We're bringing in someone with a bachelor's in computer science and less than a year of experience,' we look at that and say, 'Isn't there someone in the U.S.?'

"The engineering profession is so cyclical," Kostek said. "We have to look at what's in the best interest of the profession in the long term."

Proponents of raising the cap agree that what matters most are the highly skilled workers on whom key programs depend.

"We use this visa to hire mostly design engineers with advanced degrees," Intel Corp. attorney Coeta Chambers testified at a hearing last fall in California.

"Although the number of foreign nationals we hire is small compared to overall hiring, each individual hire is key because of the shrinking pool of skilled labor."

Rather than taking jobs away from U.S. citizens, H1B visa holders are often key to creating more jobs, she and others said.

Intel's Pro Share desktop video conferencing system was developed by two people, one a legal immigrant who is a senior technical marketing engineer. "This one technological advancement," Chambers said, "has created about 500 jobs."

OUTREACH

become part of the the fabric of the community," he continued.

The panel explored cultural and racial conflict resolution through understanding different perspectives.

"In a dispute, particularly one that is volatile, the key issue is to make connections that will allow people to see each other as individuals," said Petersen.

Although the audience was mostly made up of ROTC members, a handful of civilian students also expressed interest in conflict resolution.

Mariana Corozo, director of programs at the International Student Center, said she attended the panel to help understand conflicts within the international student community.

"We work with people from different cultures, and sometimes there are misunderstandings and problems – I am trying to bring this back to the work I do," she said.

NASA Gen. John R. Dailey's speech capped off the event. He spoke not only on international conflict resolution, but also on his experiences as an UCLA student many years ago.

Executive Vice Chancellor Charles Kennel presented Dailey with a UCLA pin, which he said he will wear with pride as he confronts his coworkers.

"This place provided me with a foundation that carried me through life; I learned more here than anywhere else," he said.

"It opened my eyes to things I was not aware of before, because of the cosmopolitan and international environment," he added.

Dailey used U.S. relations with Russia as an example of the need to learn cultural differences in order to communicate successfully.

"Vodka is an essential part of Russian negotiation – they take it as an insult if you don't drink," he said.

To comply with this, Dailey said he always has a bottle of vodka (approved by the state department) in his NASA office in case he needs to negotiate with Russian delegates.

"We had to be aware of different cultural customs in order to communicate successfully," he added.

RATINGS

network programming during the 8 p.m. to 9 p.m. EST weekday hour and 7 p.m. to 9 p.m. slot on Sunday found that 65 percent of shows containing at least one obscenity failed to carry an "L" rating for coarse language, the study said.

Of the early-evening shows that included sexual innuendo, 76 percent did not carry the "D" rating intended to flag sexually-themed dialogue, the council found.

Among the examples offered was an exchange on CBS' "The Nanny" in which one character says she's found "the perfect subject for our one-person play." The reply: "Your sex life."

"If they're going to have ratings, they should be consistent across the board," Mark Honig, the council's executive director, said Tuesday. But of greater concern is the nature of programs airing at a time children tend to watch TV, he said.

"The real solution to the problem is cleaning up content in that first hour of primetime programming," said Honig, whose Los Angeles-based PTC is part of the conservative Media Research Center, a watchdog group in Alexandria, Va.

The designations "V," "S," "L" and "D" – for violence, sex, possibly offensive language and suggestive dialogue – were added last fall to the original age-based ratings that include TV-PG and TV-14.

Jack Valenti, the Motion Picture Association of America president who oversaw creation of the 14-month-old ratings system, said it has drawn virtually no complaints to his group or to TV stations nationwide.

"From the public standpoint, I guess you must say silence is consent," Valenti said. "The criticism is not there."

Advocacy groups and some politicians are condemning the system because it "did not produce radical change in what they perceive to be the wrong kind of program," Valenti said.

That was never the intent – the ratings are solely informational, Valenti said.

The council's survey focused on ABC, CBS, Fox, UPN and WB programs for Oct. 30 through Nov. 19. NBC, which has refused to use the letter designations, was excluded from that portion of the study.

Though some networks were bigger violators in labeling, the study found none had a clean slate. Fox was the best at applying accurate labels but still got it right only about a third of the time, in the council's estimation. CBS was judged to be the worst.

The group also assessed generally how family-friendly the networks were in the early evening hours.

NBC aired more foul language in the period than the other networks, ABC had the most sexual references and CBS the most violence, the study found.

Fox's "Beverly Hills 90210" and "Melrose Place" needed "their mouths washed out," the study said, because of a heavy reliance on expletives.

VICE CHANCELLOR

California campuses.

Unlike a search committee, which the chancellor would only meet with periodically, this advisory committee will be run by the chancellor.

The committee accepted applications for the position, but they are not limiting themselves to only those who have expressed interest.

"I don't believe that people should be put into the position of going for the job," said Carnesale.

"I am just as interested in names that are brought to my attention by others as I am with people who nominate themselves," he continued.

"In all cases, we look for both internal and external candidates. You want the best person you can get," the chancellor said.

To form and execute academic policies, Neufeld said she thinks that it is important that the person be valued as a scholar and understand scholarship.

"The person should be a good administrator, be able to get people to follow his or her lead, and be able to build consensus," she said.

Kennel, thinking of the personal qualities that he has found necessary, added, "it helps to enjoy working with professors and students."

"We hope to be able to do this on a relatively short time table because we are constraining it to folks who have some experiences in the UC system," said Carnesale.

IRAQ

Saddam Hussein because he is a promoter of war. War is good because it strengthens the economy of the country," said Nami Ishimori, a first-year undeclared student.

Without the Iraqi situation, Doug Stetzer, a broker with the ED and F Man in New York, said that the U.S. market would be "fundamentally weak." Conflict in the Gulf drives oil prices up. But prices fell after Annan's spokesman, Fred Eckhardt, said a deal had been reached with Iraq.

Years of conflict with Hussein and the continual oppression of the Iraqi people, despite the actions of both the United States and the United Nations, have caused speculation on why the United States has not considered tactics other than sanctions and military mobilization.

"The U.S. should stop Saddam Hussein through different avenues," said Rizvi, who feels that the bombing of Iraq and sanctions have only succeeded in causing the Iraqis to needlessly suffer.

Shama agreed. "First, Saddam Hussein must be removed from power. Second, the U.S.' policy must be changed in regards to the people of Iraq," he said.

Some students feel that the United States should withdraw troops from Iraq and not involve themselves.

"The U.S. should just mind their own business and leave Iraq alone," said Shannon Moore, a first-year undeclared student.

Shama also agreed that United States should abstain from action, but for different reasons.

"The U.S. is not the country that should remove Hussein from power. The U.S. has proved to be oppressive and only interested in fulfilling economic needs," Shama said.

"I really wish that a humanitarian country would remove Hussein from power, but the power does not lay in humanitarian countries," he added.

MSA believes that the United States is the only country with enough power to make any difference in Iraq, and, so far, no actions have been productive enough to resolve their complicated problems.

"If America isn't going to care, who will?" Rizvi asked.

EDUCATION

GSE&IS.

"If you want to send more letters to us, please do," she told them. "We here at UCLA want to hear what you have to say."

Though there is no direct research showing that early exposure to college affects a child's desire to pursue a higher education, it has been shown that attitudes toward school are formed at a young age. Cognitive psychology has suggested that attitudes and feelings are formed at infancy, including developing positive attitudes toward education, Williams added.

"A lot of children from underrepresented races don't always understand that as a public university, everyone has the opportunity to come study here," Williams said.

With the elimination of affirmative action programs, many educators believe that campus diversity will be greatly threatened in the future. "If you want to have a diverse campus, we are going to have to explore innovative ways to help prepare students for universities," Williams said.

"Without affirmative action, we realized the increasing need to start building college expectations in students early," said Sidnie Myrick, a UCLA alumna and one of two teachers of the class.

Additionally, the day served to build a greater awareness of college for parents as well.

"It is a great experience for the kids, for them to see that there are opportunities to have a better life," said Lida Balalians, a mother and one of five parent chaperones.

The visit to the college campus is part of a two-month long unit on making life choices, where the children have been reading novels and listening to guest speakers, like a policeman and comic-book writer.

Prior to coming, the class discussed the admissions processes, how grades are important and the importance of developing excellent study habits early. Myrick, who has taught for 10 years, spoke about the appeal that college has to especially young children.

"For them, the idea of being able to go to a place and learn more about their favorite subjects is like being in heaven," she said, adding that they were ecstatic to find out that the campus boasts multiple libraries.

Students who wrote personal essays answered one of the three essays listed on the current application for undergraduate admission. The topics ask the students to write about a specific talent, a difficult experience or an academic achievement they felt would help enrich the university environment.

"The worst time in my life was when I was moving to another house," wrote second-grader Alyssa De Jesus. "I missed my friends.

"This experience taught me how to get through rough times. I could get through rough times at UCLA, too," she wrote.

Another student wrote about her mother's operation as being the most difficult time of her life.

"This time showed me to not be afraid," Cynthia Salgado wrote. "It showed me that everything will be alright if I believe in myself and help others.

"This is how I am going to help others at UCLA," she concluded.

Though this is the first time such a young group has been exposed to the UCLA campus, Myrick hopes to follow up with the class, perhaps in a few years. "It would be interesting to track this class and see where they are in seven or eight years," she said.

For now, the children seemed satisfied with their first college experience. "I want to stay here for the rest of my life," Joseph said, "I would sleep, eat and play all day."

THUMBS UP THUMBS DOWN

No kisses, no hugs, no fair

Thumbs down to the administrators and ridiculous policies at Nicholas Junior High School in Fullerton; students were banned from hugging, kissing or any other public displays of affection.

Within the days preceding St. Valentine's Day, the policy began to draw fire from students on campus.

Tammy A. Brown, interim principal of the school, said that the purpose of the ban was to keep students from engaging in "anything that disrupts the learning environment. The rule is to keep your hands and your feet to yourself. The guideline is no inappropriate displays of affection."

Angered students took their concerns to the school board meeting. A board member said that the policy, which was adopted seven years ago, would not be changed and that the policy would be helpful in preventing sexual harassment cases.

Though no hugging is allowed, Brown noted that students are allowed to give each other high fives.

Poor sports in Nagano

Thumbs down to poor sportsmanship on the part of members of the U.S. Olympic men's hockey team. The team, which featured NHL players, was expected to be a possible contender for the bronze medal.

Many were disappointed when the team lost to the Czech Republic and was consequently out of competition.

In frustration about the loss, U.S. alternate captain Keith Thachuk said, "It was the biggest waste of time – ever."

Mike Modano, a fellow teammate, stated that "everybody's shocked and disappointed, a lot of guys are frustrated, thinking it was a waste of time ... to come over here at all."

Although the Olympic experience must have been an extreme letdown for the team members, their behavior is inexcusable and disgraceful.

Thumbs Up/Thumbs Down represents a majority opinion of the Daily Bruin Editorial Board. Send comments or suggestions to viewpoint@media.ucla.edu.

Military action downright hypocritical

WAR: U.S. cannot rightly justify bombing Iraq, killing innocent civilians

Garrick Ruiz

I can only hope that by the time this is published this wondrous country that I was born in is still not dropping bombs on a population halfway around the world for reasons that are utterly despicable. I don't know exactly what will happen, but I hope for peace. Unfortunately, it doesn't seem very likely, now that Bill Clinton's got his macho hat on and feels like he needs to save the world.

Before I go on, I should say that I think killing people, especially civilians, is very rarely justified, and that the use of the military (an institution whose very purpose has always been to kill) to invade other countries is even more rarely justified. I also believe that hypocrisy is a bad thing. So this article is going to be biased in that direction.

Ruiz can be reached at ice9@ucla.edu for questions or comments. He'd love to hear what you think.

The administration has put forth five main reasons for why the United States should bomb Iraq. They are: (1) the strategic value of the Persian Gulf, (2) proliferation of non-conventional arms, (3) containment of aggression, (4) superpower responsibility, and (5) U.N. credibility. Let's examine each of these reasons in detail.

First, the strategic value of the Persian Gulf: the administration seems to be trying to convince us that the availability of large reserves of oil in the region means that we should invade and keep people friendly to the United States in power. Sure, oil is very important to the economy, but is it worth the lives it will cost? Certainly some Americans and huge numbers of Iraqis will die – in both the military and in civilian populations. Oil isn't a valid justification for mass killing, especially considering the Middle East is not our only source of oil. The United States has its own oil reserves, not to mention the surpluses it has built up since the oil crisis of the '70s. Many other countries we are on good terms with, such as Saudi Arabia and Kuwait, also have large amounts of oil. Oddly enough, these countries are far from being democratic, yet we aren't yelling and screaming about their governments. Makes you wonder if something else is at work here rather than a love of democracy.

Countries from other areas of the world, such as Mexico and other Latin American nations, also have large reserves of oil. So why the big deal with capturing oil in Iraq?

Second, proliferation of non-conventional arms: this is just a joke. The United States has more nuclear weapons than any other nation on the planet. We have more destructive capability than any other nation, and we are going to bomb a country for attempting to arm themselves (this is what I meant by hypocrisy). Let's not forget that the United States is one of the only countries that has refused to sign the international landmine ban treaty for which the Nobel Peace Prize was awarded last year. It doesn't seem like we're really all that interested in stopping the spread of weapons, conventional or not. Even if you argue that we need to stop the proliferation of weapons to non-democratic countries, many non-democratic countries have weapons of mass destruction, and we don't seem to be worrying about them too much.

> The United States itself has never shied away from aggression and invasion when it has suited them.

Third, containment of aggression: again, the history of U.S. foreign policy contradicts this statement. If we are really concerned about aggression, why have we done nothing about Indonesia's brutal occupation of East Timor except support it? Why is it that we are so friendly toward China despite their brutal, borderline genocidal treatment of the people of Tibet? Why do we support Israel in its occupation of the West Bank, the Gaza Strip, the Golan Heights and the repression of the Palestinian people? Of course there's the fact that the United States itself has never shied away from aggression and invasion when it has suited them. In 1989, under Bush (the same man who was to later denounce Saddam Hussein's invasion of Kuwait), the United States invaded Panama; in the '80s we invaded Grenada, and there was also the Vietnam War. This is quite a track record of aggression.

Fourthly, superpower responsibility: this argument seems to rest on the fact that since the United States defeated the Soviet Union in the Cold War, it has a responsibility to protect the world – to be the world's peacekeeper. The United States acts like it is the morally superior country that it constantly makes itself out to be, just because the Soviet Union crumbled while the United States prospered. It's also interesting that the way this "peacekeeper" claims its superiority is by killing lots of people (it's kind of reflective of how we name missiles peacekeepers, even though an explosive device is never going to keep the peace).

Finally, United Nations credibility: while Iraq has violated a few of the rules established by the United Nations after the Persian Gulf War, it is truly inane to insist Iraq complies with all the U.N. provisions when we do not force other countries to do the same. Similarly, Indonesia's occupation of East Timor has been denounced by the U.N. several times, and yet, we do nothing. Israel's occupation of its conquered lands has been denounced more than once as well; again, we do nothing. The United Nations has always been dominated by the United States and other western countries, but when it doesn't function exactly as the United States would like, it simply ignores anything the United Nations says. The way the United Nations has been treated shows that it is merely cited when it is in line with American objectives, and

SPIRITUALITY: On campus religion pushers should tone down sales pitches

Sonia Ortega

I grew up Catholic. And to the dismay of any family members who may be reading this, I haven't gone to church much since I started college. At first I thought it was a universal truth, because I met quite a few people at UCLA who gave up organized religion when it came time to hit the books. I doubt they used Sunday mornings to study; I suspect the real culprit was too much partying Saturday night. I used laziness as an excuse. It's much different to walk for half an hour than to drive for five minutes to get to church. Regardless, I tried to ease my guilty conscious with the fact that most people didn't go to church at UCLA because we're sinful college students, and hell, we're only young once.

That is, until some people invited me to go to their church. And then another, and another, and yet another. They were all very friendly and very persistent. And they all got on my nerves. Did I look hell-bent?

Ortega is a fourth-year student at the School of Film and Television. E-mail her at sortega@ucla.edu.

Angry at the world? In need of spiritual guidance and heavenly assistance? I wasn't obnoxious enough to tell them I'm a devil worshipper, or sarcastic enough to tell them I'm Jewish, Buddhist or any other religionAfrican American people aren't traditionally associated with. Although I have yet to go to church with a complete stranger, these people have made me think about a lot of things.

First off, what is it that makes these people walk up to random students and invite them to church? If I eat at a good restaurant I'll recommend it to my friends. I might suggest a film to my mom. But I would never turn to a passerby and ask, "Are you looking for a good Chinese restaurant?" Or, "Want to watch a good action flick this weekend?" So when it comes to much deeper matters such as spirituality, I am boggled that people ask me to come to their church as though they're asking me to eat at a new café.

Why this drive to increase membership? I know that good Christians are supposed to spread the word. I know that some people are in desperate need of guidance and are just waiting for an invitation to church, Bible study or some sort of positive influence in their lives. But believe me, there are Too quick to judge

I am writing in response to Michael Urcan's Feb. 18 letter, "Good Riddance." I do not know Jelani McCoy personally, which is why I would never presume to judge his actions or decisions. But obviously, Urcan feels that he is the overriding authority in this matter. Urcan makes sweeping generalizations to support his weak argument that McCoy "represents everything 'bad' about the game." I just cannot bring myself to agree with that statement. As far as I can remember, Jelani has not had a history of "bad" behavior. He hasn't gambled on basketball games. He hasn't shaved points. He hasn't taken money from any agents. Nevertheless, according to Urcan, he represents everything "bad" about the game.

Urcan proceeds to critique McCoy's "alleged decision" to enter the NBA. The reasoning for this critique is Urcan's "belief" that McCoy is a nationwide role model and is only interested in the money. I cannot vouch for Urcan, but I don't recall anyone saying how disappointed they were because their "twenty-something college athlete role model" was resigning from the UCLA basketball team. Speaking of playing for the money, how about those outrageous signing bonuses athletes are awarded?

Lastly, Urcan calls McCoy a quitter and says that he is the "perfect example of what someone in his situation shouldn't have done." Now, what exactly was that situation again? What were the details? Oh, yeah, Urcan doesn't know the details of Jelani's situation. All he knows (or presumes to know) are rumors. And based on these rumors, Urcan subjects McCoy's character to his wild conjectures.

By making allegations without any facts to back them up, it is people like Urcan that represent everything "bad" about the game.

it is otherwise not listened to.

In spite of my argument against war, in no way do I think that Saddam Hussein is a good guy, nor am I defending him. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright accused some of the questioners in last week's town hall meeting in Columbus, Ohio, of defending Hussein. But the question isn't about Hussein; the question is about the United States and whether or not we are proceeding in a way conducive to the values of the people and in accordance with human rights. Hussein is a horrible person, in my opinion, but so is Clinton; Clinton just happens to have bigger guns.

Besides, the United States helped put Hussein where he is by giving Iraq immense amounts of aid during the war between Iran and Iraq in the '80s, despite having known that he used chemical weapons in that war. Looking back, one former Reagan official said, "Hussein is a bastard. But at the time, he was our bastard." Typical of the United States – it doesn't matter how detestable you are. As long as you do what we want, you're our friend. But as soon as you stray from the straight and narrow path we have dictated to you, you are suddenly "the next Hitler."

> Any military action the United States takes is very unlikely to affect Hussein ... This is not the case for the Iraqi(s).

Any military action the United States takes is very unlikely to affect Hussein. I'm sure he has protection that would keep him from being injured or killed. This is not the case for the Iraqi people. When bombs start dropping, civilians are going to die. These numerous deaths will include a disproportionate amount of civilians.

So, if there are any peace lovers out there, I say we take a cue from the folks in Columbus and yell and scream until we force them to allow us to be heard, because I guarantee you that Clinton and his cronies will do anything they can to silence anyone who expresses viewpoints different from their own.

Since writing the bulk of this column it seems that the Secretary General of the U.N. has come to an agreement with Hussein. It remains to be seen how the United States will respond to this. However, the administration is still reserving the right to go ahead with a military strike if they don't like the agreement. Guess we aren't really all that concerned with international law after all. I can only hope that Clinton takes this opportunity to diffuse a volatile situation.

people who want to be left alone. There are people for whom this sort of spirituality won't work. I can respect some people with the courage to walk up to others, share their good experiences and invite them to participate. But when people ask me to come to their church and I say "No," I would appreciate it if they would leave it at that. Instead, many follow with a litany of questions.

Are you attending church right now? Do you study the Bible? And when I say that I'm Catholic, every single person who has approached me says, "Oh, I used to be Catholic."

Every single person! The first couple of times I thought it was a coincidence, but now I am convinced it is an evil conspiracy because Catholicism is not the majority religion in the United States. Even if I suppose that they all were telling the truth, why must they imply that if they used to be Catholic and found solace with their new church, I will also choose to abandon Catholicism in favor of their group? It's almost insulting.

It makes me question the real motives of their approach. Do they want me to have some spirituality in my life, or does it have to do with their spirituality? I am very wary of people who claim that there is only one right way. God, or whichever higher power one chooses to believe in, made people in all different colors and all different types. But everyone on the planet breathes air and goes to the bathroom, so I'm sure it could have been arranged that we all practice the same religion. I don't place much stock in the idea of being saved.

> I get sucked into the conversation every time, and I don't know how to get out.

Anyone who knows me will understand the difficulty I have telling these people no. I actually am not as wimpy as I used be, but I cannot bear to be rude, and sometimes this is all it will take to get someone to leave me alone. I should be able to see them coming a mile away, but I get sucked into the conversation every time, and I don't know how to get out.

Of course I ask myself, why don't I try this new group? I did go once because my friend from high school invited me. I only went because he promised me that if I tried once he would never ask about it again, and he kept his word. It wasn't a bad experience, and the people were friendly and seemed to really enjoy each other's presence. But it wasn't me. And I know it's not right for a lot of people.

Religion can be a beautiful thing.

> (Being invited) reminds me ... why I took a hiatus from Catholicism.

It always saddens me when someone tells me he doesn't believe in God or some higher power. I think the right religious or spiritual path is essential for peace of mind. But religion can also be manipulative, and it can fail to provide people with what they really need. Right now organized religion isn't right for me.

Whenever someone invites me to go to church, it reminds me all over again why I took a hiatus from Catholicism. My aversion toward walking for half an hour may have been the initial cause, but there are deeper and more serious reasons.

Actually, this year, I have only been approached by one person. I think it is because I am not on campus very much. I am sure that most people have been caught up in this uncomfortable situation, and I hope they have found more effective ways to deal with it than I have. I don't mind so much when someone approaches me, but I do mind when she becomes intrusive and rude. It makes me wonder what this religion is really doing for that person.

FANNING THE FLAMES

Joe Ezsterhas' new mockumentary of the film industry, 'Burn Hollywood Burn,' may be even truer to life than the screenwriter himself would like to admit

By Matthew Schmid
Daily Bruin Senior Staff

From the ashes of the most heavily criticized film of the decade was born a movie lashing out to burn the film industry in a way that no other Hollywood production has done in recent years.

Writer Joe Ezsterhas began working on his latest project, "An Alan Smithee Film: Burn Hollywood Burn" while faced with the aftermath of his now infamous movie "Showgirls."

"I had such welts on my back and 'Showgirls' had been chainsawed to death," Ezsterhas told a UCLA Extension film class earlier this month. "I was reading all of these reviews but I thought it was time to have some fun with my writing life."

Looking to do something more flippant and free-spirited, the notorious writer of "Basic Instinct" and "Jade" started work on his latest film.

"Burn Hollywood Burn" is a mockumentary which explains a little-known La-la Land tidbit. The Directors Guild of America has dedicated a pseudonym to be used by movie directors who no longer wish to be associated with projects that they have started: Alan Smithee.

Projects which have used the pseudonym include the horror flick "Stitches" (1985) and the TV pilot for "McGyver" (1985).

"Burn Hollywood Burn" features an eager director (Eric Idle) who is selected by the fictitious movie studio Challenger Films more for his passive temperament than for his directing capabilities.

Having lost creative control of the film to studio president Jerry Glover (Richard Jeni) and egotistical producer James Edmunds (Ryan O'Neal), the director decides that he simply cannot put his name on a movie which is no longer representative of his work.

Unfortunately for the director, his name actually is Alan Smithee.

"I thought it would be fun to depict a director whose name really is Alan Smithee, with the irony being that he could never truly remove his name from any of his films," Ezsterhas says.

Left with no out, Smithee steals the film's final negative, now the most expensive in motion picture history, and instigates the greatest Hollywood scandal ever.

"People who like it really like it, and people who don't really don't," Ezsterhas says.

Ezsterhas says that the movie is "the greatest scam I

'Mystic Saints' premieres at UCLA

MUSIC: Philaharmonic will perform a collection of works based on poetry

By Michael Gillette
Daily Bruin Contributor

For orchestral composer and UCLA alumnus Christopher Caliendo, tonight will be a very special homecoming.

The UCLA Philharmonic will perform a program of his works, collectively titled "The Mystic Saints: A Musical Drama" at Schoenberg Hall, and Caliendo, who received his Master of Arts here in 1989, will attend.

Tonight's audience is the first to have a chance to experience this long-evolving work at its midway point.

The program began with a commission from the Vatican (the first ever offered to an American) for an orchestral work with text. Allowed to choose the source of his work through independent research, Caliendo adapted the poetry of 16th century Spanish mystic poetess St. Teresa of Avila.

"I looked through the Mystic Saints, with whom I already had a familiarity," Caliendo says, "and I settled on Teresa. Her poetry, we know, has never been held in high regard by scholars because it is seen as not rigidly logical. But I found that her (lack of precise formula) rendered her work more candid and human and that those qualities allowed it to fit with the music I sought to compose."

The piece itself premiered in Italy in 1992 at the "Encounters of Sacred Contemporary Music" festival in Italy before an audience that included Caliendo's own parents and countless high officers of the Catholic church. He speaks with both eloquence and awe when recalling that day.

"One can only imagine the state of mind one is in," Caliendo says. "It was truly one of those moments where you could imagine leaving the world in a state of rapture. It sounds inhuman to say. But it comes from this feeling of having accomplished so much."

A second Vatican commission followed the next year, and Caliendo turned again to the Mystical Saints, choosing this time the work of St. John of the Cross. According to Caliendo, however, internal politics at the festival prevented the work from appearing as scheduled, which makes tonight's performance at Schoenberg a world premiere.

Caliendo has further plans for the Mystic Saints project, which is already seven years in the making. He intends to turn next to the Franciscan monks and write programs based on the works of St. Francis and St. Claire. Caliendo sees in these religious authors kindred spirits, saying that the "constant devotion and concentration" with which he approaches his art is similar to the fervor of the saints' spiritual pursuits.

UCLA Music Department

Christopher Caliendo, composer of Mystic Saints.

Caliendo's projected destination for the four-act program of the Mystical Saints is Broadway. And if serious sacred compositions on the Great White Way seem like an anomaly, this does not deter their composer in the least. Instead, Caliendo voices excitement about the technical possibilities a large scale theatrical show offers. Lighting effects and holograms, he says, can "edify the music" and enhance the spiritual experience of the program.

In this way, Caliendo eschews what he sees as the more regimenting and stultifying effects that modernism has placed on music specifically and art in general. For his inspiration he reaches back to the romantic period, which he describes as "a time of an incredible outpouring of human emotion."

"From that time," Caliendo says, "came the music of Beethoven, Mendelsshon and Chopin, and the literature of Dostoevsky and Victor Hugo. These are the men I consider my peers. My music hearkens back to that time, and I try to convey to the audience that feeling."

MUSIC: "The Mystic Saints: A Musical Drama" premieres tonight at 8 p.m. in Schoenberg Hall. Tickets are $20 for general admission and $10 for students with ID. Call (310) 825-4761.

Remembering the 'forgotten Holocaust'

BOOK: 'Rape of Nanking' chronicles horrifying, graphic cruelties of war

By Christopher Bates
Daily Bruin Contributor

"War is cruelty," said Gen. William Tecumseh Sherman in 1863. Sherman was speaking of his own war, the U.S. Civil War. However, his point has become relevant even during the 20th century. With the development of weapons of mass destruction, mankind has been able to inflict cruelties unheard of fourscore and seven years ago.

Sometimes the cruelties have been so great, so horrifying, that there has been resistance to incorporating them into the historical record. Such has been the case with the events Iris Chang chronicles in "The Rape of Nanking."

In December of 1937, Japanese troops managed to capture Nanking, then the capital city of China. It was the successful culmination of a six-month long struggle with Chiang Kai-shek's troops in the Yangtze valley. For the Chinese, it was a crushing defeat.

What followed were the sort of unspeakable atrocities that human beings like to think of themselves as be, - incapable of. Between 260,000 and 350,000 people were killed in an eight-week period. Chinese men, women and children were used for target practice, decapitation contests, and, of course, as victims of rape. The destruction was finally curtailed with the establishment of a "Safety Zone" controlled by Westerners.

BOOK REVIEW

The Rape of Nanking
Author: Iris Chang
Publisher: BasicBooks
Price: $25 hardcover
Grade: ★★★★☆

MARK DITTMER/Daily Bruin

Given the nature of the crime and the time frame, even the most historically uninformed reader will be inclined to draw a comparison between the rape of Nanking and the Holocaust. Chang notes the parallels frequently; in fact her account is subtitled "The Forgotten Holocaust of World War II" and is in many ways structured like a history of the German-initiated Holocaust.

Chang begins with the political and historical context for the Japanese invasion of Nanking. The typical Holocaust narrative generally begins with the end of World War I and the punishment inflicted upon the Germans at the end of that conflict in 1918. This is an extremely shortsighted approach, for the tensions that led to the Holocaust date back much further than that.

Chang improves on this approach a bit by starting her narrative in 1852, with the arrival of American troops under Matthew Perry. She argues that his swashbuckling display of force created immense resentment among the Japanese and awoke a militaristic strain in Japanese culture that made the rape of Nanking possible. Going back this far is an improvement, but she would have done better to go even further

Mime master Marceau silently returns to steal show

ART: Performer famous for role of BIP, will grace the L.A. stage once again

By Aimee Phan
Daily Bruin Staff

Marcel Marceau once said, "Never get a mime talking. He won't stop." But the world's most famous mime for 50 years is sitting down to talk, to promote his return appearance to Los Angeles this Saturday night and to reflect on his long and incredibly successful career.

Marceau is widely regarded today as the master of modern mime who brought the ancient art into the mainstream consciousness with sold-out performances around the world and frequent television and movie appearances. But after his last performance in Los Angeles in 1989, Marceau's popularity and name diminished a bit in the '90s since the only way for people to appreciate the mime was to see him perform.

Nearly a decade later, Marceau is returning to Los Angeles for a one-night show to celebrate the 50th anniversary of his most popular pantomime character, BIP. In this rare appearance, Marceau will perform some of his most classic "mimodramas" from his repertoire. With nearly half a century of performing under his belt, Marceau takes his pioneering role in the world of pantomime very seriously.

"I think I was born to be a mime like one is born to be a painter or musician," Marceau says. "I'm responsible for the renaissance of this art in the 20th century and in two years, I'm going to handle the 21st century and I predict that mime will become a strong force in the theater."

Despite the fact that his name may not be as well known as it used to be, Marceau is very confident that once people see his show, they will be just as enthusiastic and responsive as his audiences have been in the past. He believes that although times have changed since the first time he performed in America in 1955, people are moved and inspired by good performances.

"Man has not changed," Marceau says. "We have changed with technology and communication, but in our real hearts, man has not changed since the Romans. We could always laugh and cry for the same reasons. The emotions are always there. If the show is good, it touches the public."

Born in France, Marceau began his career in 1946 when he joined the Charles Dullin's School of Dramatic Art in Paris and studied under mime master Etienne Decroux. After studying and performing with some of the most influential pantomime artists in France, Marceau emerged into immense popularity after creating his now legendary character, BIP, the silent actor and clown. He named his famous opera hat-wearing character after the main character in Charles Dickens' novel, "Great Expectations."

"When I was 20, I had great expectations so BIP comes from Pip and I changed the 'P' to a 'B,'" Marceau says. "I was a great admirer of Charles Dickens."

After BIP became such a popular character, Marceau started touring worldwide, bringing his mimodramas to many stages, introducing people to a performing art that had little exposure before. His first American tour in 1955 caught the attention of many people in Hollywood, which was a thrill for the artist who grew up idolizing American actors like Charlie Chaplin, Buster Keaton and Laurel and Hardy. He explains that although these silent stars were labeled as movie actors, their work is derived from pantomime.

"I was inspired by them when I was Common anything but in live concert

MUSIC: Listeners marvel at band's energy, talent in House of Blues show

By Jeremy Engel
Daily Bruin Contributor

Virgin Records

Southern California's home-grown ensemble, Common Sense, flaunted their professional, crowd-moving sound Saturday night at the House of Blues.

Bringing elements of reggae, ska and rock to their tunes, Common Sense's energy and style gave concert-goers something to get excited about during their hour-and-a-half set.

Common Sense has a large local following that could expand to the national level soon. They have already sold out the House of Blues several times before, evidence of their snowballing popularity here in Los Angeles. Additionally, their professional stage presence and stellar musical skill make them a treat to experience in a live performance, and their jolly lead singer, Nick Hernandez, can surely pump any crowd into a fun-loving frenzy.

Lead by Hernandez, who danced, contorted and gestured to the music like a Joe Cocker and Chris Farley hybrid, Common Sense's stage presence allowed for a lively and entertaining evening. Furthermore, the band's tight horn section and talented musicianship made the songs memorable and the dancing impossible to avoid.

At the House of Blues, the upstairs bar splits in two so the show can be heard throughout the whole place. This happened shortly after 9 p.m. Saturday. First-time patrons stared in awe. The split also allowed restaurant goers upstairs to join the festivities.

Two unremarkable bands opened for Common Sense. The first, a punky rock group that sang a song about kissing someone's ass; the second, a groovy though dull band known as Spencer the Gardner.

Common Sense made the wait worthwhile, however, recharging the crowd around midnight when they finally blasted onto stage.

"Yes, Common Sense!" one drunken fan yelled before collapsing to the floor, miraculously not spilling a single drop of the Rolling Rock in his hand even as he fell into a deep slumber under the bar.

Highlights included a rousing anthem of perseverance and devotion called "Never Give Up," and a clever tune with a lot of pep called "Good Girl/Bad Man."

Hernandez, who hopped around stage in a black feather boa and frequently rubbed his newly clean-shaven head, kept chatter to a minimum and

Choreographer spreads the word in latest creative feat

DANCE: Paul Taylor finds renewed focus on bizarre religious rituals

By Annette Grant
The New York Times

Paul Taylor is not only a choreographer but a writer, an artist, an avid reader, a collector of objects and creatures found in the wild and a lover of all music, except perhaps contemporary jazz and Mozart ("too elegant" for setting to dances).

He likes physical work and has built, without a yardstick, a bungalow on Long Island, N.Y., using only driftwood and other flotsam. Yet, like many who occupy rarefied creative planes, he doesn't know, for example, which subway stops nearest his Manhattan residence.

Taylor has made more than 100 dances in 45 years, many of them acclaimed masterpieces. How does he do it over and over again? He doesn't exactly know, he explained recently at his row house in the West Village. Opening his very blue eyes very wide, Taylor said: "It's my job. Making dance is what I do. I just can't help it, I guess."

Well, in the case of his latest dance, "The Word," maybe the Devil made him do it, but he has done it again nonetheless.

"The Word," which will have its premiere when the Paul Taylor Dance Company opens its two-week season at City Center on Tuesday, draws its title from the opening lines of the Bible. It is a dark piece exploring questions of faith and the dangers of religious orthodoxy, issues that periodically bubble up in the choreographer's work.

In recent years, Taylor, who is 66, has produced mostly lyrical and wryly comical works. But, Janus-faced, he has always worked in light and shade. "The Word" is more in the mold of " ... Byzantium," his 1984 meditation on the end of civilization, "Last Look," a 1985 piece about a nervous breakdown that is revived on the current program, and "Speaking in Tongues," about the tribulations of a fundamentalist preacher, from 1988.

"Starting points for 'The Word' are the Bible and the Byzantine era," Taylor said. "I'm very interested in religious wars, the machine-like quality of ritual and in the general notion of brainwashing and brutality."

The convoluted religious and political currents of the Byzantine Empire, a 1,000-year reign ending about 1450, seemed a natural realm

TAYLOR

for him, especially, he said, in terms of imagery. But first he needed music and decided to commission a score from David Israel, who collaborated with him last year on "Prime Numbers," a jazz-infused tribute to Indian dance that is also on the City Center program.

In May, Taylor and Israel went to the Metropolitan Museum of Art to see the "Glory of Byzantium" exhibition, and there they stood for a long time in front of "Icon With the Heavenly Ladder of John Klimax," a 12th-century Egyptian painting showing devils plucking the faithful from their path to heaven.

"Paul liked the colors and the two-dimensionality of the painting," Israel said. "We both saw it as a parallel to a present-day struggle with a loss of faith, not just in God, but in anything."

Israel began to research the music of the time, finding some of his best material on the Internet at the Holy Cross Bookstore site, part of the Greek Orthodox Archdiocese of America.

"Paul would listen to sections of the composition and offer suggestions," Israel said. "He was looking for driving sounds, like pistons, in some areas, but basically he was very open about where it was going."

Then Taylor stopped to choreograph "Piazzolla Caldera," an elegantly raucous distillation of the tango, set to the music of Astor Piazzolla, that won raves at the American Dance Festival last June. This firecracker will also be on the City Center program.

By the time Taylor called the first rehearsal at his studio in SoHo for "The Word" last fall, the nature of the dance was well set in his mind.

"Paul is always very prepared, very well researched," said Patrick Corbin, a dancer with the Taylor company since 1989. "The first thing he does is set the atmosphere. He talked about the Byzantine period, the wars and religion, using books and art reproductions to illustrate his points. He said we were aspects of Adam and Eve, Mary and Joseph, but maybe that was just to give us something to go with. Actually, I think I'm a gargoyle or a gatekeeper or a watchdog.

"We knew right away that this wasn't going to be charming. Paul was very specific about the kind of sculptured, almost ugly, shapes he wanted. Then we improvised a little to the music, which is usual no matter what the piece is, and he kept the things that suited the atmosphere he was looking for."

Lisa Viola, who has been with the company for six years, is a dancer Taylor saw as having "scary qualities" and the "strength and daring to carry it off." In "The Word" she plays a snakelike creature who, with a fierce scowl and a little V-shaped hand movement, manages to look thoroughly fearsome.

For this piece, Paul wanted grotesque," Viola said. "He's always open to what dancers offer, and images just keep popping out of you. So I played with it for a couple of weeks, and Paul kept telling me: 'Stay evil. Don't feel pretty.'"

> ("The Word") is a dark piece exploring questions of faith and the dangers of religious orthodoxy.

According to Viola, one of the secrets of the highly aerobic piece is that its tortured nature is enhanced by how difficult the contorted movements are to perform at speed.

Viola took the Stygian mood of the "The Word" as a sign that Taylor was in fine fettle. "If he's feeling good, he'll do evil; if he's feeling bad, he'll do light," she said.

Taylor likes the early parts of creating a new work with his company, of being able to "noodle around" and to keep things he sees or to throw them out. David Parsons, a former Taylor star who now runs his own New York company, has great respect for anyone who can chuck weeks of work.

"The whole process of choreography is working with fear," Parsons said. "You wonder where the work is going to come from. Sometimes you get stuck and things don't jell. Then you need the courage to start over."

Parsons, who affectionately calls some of Taylor's lighter pieces, "cornography," was in the original cast of three 1980 works that are in the current City Center season: "Arden Court," "Mercuric Tidings" and "Last Look," which are certainly not corn on anyone's cob.

"Paul works with a sort of structured improv," Parsons said. "I could feel that sometimes he was blocked. But other times he came in with total focus. He did my 'Last Look' solo in less than an hour. In 'Arden Court,' he set up a competition of male hormones and let it just sweep over us. The guy's a taskmaster, but he makes you see his vision fully, which is in itself an art form. I would love to live in a society made up in Paul's brain."

Of course, such a society can be interpreted in a variety of ways, especially by a costume designer, in the case of "The Word," Santo Loquasto, a longtime collaborator with Taylor as well as a designer for the films of Woody Allen and Broadway shows like "Grand Hotel" and "Ragtime."

"Paul has an American primitive spirit, and I try to tap into it," Loquasto said. Seeking to underline the ritualistic aspects of "The Word," he came up with unisex parochial-school uniforms: lace-up shoes, fitted navy-blue knickers, white shirts with ties, and bright red lipstick for both men and women.

The look may not be so far from the works at the Metropolitan. "The striking thing in the paintings is that the figures are awkward and stiff," Taylor said. "No one ever smiles. There's something very spooky about it. And then one night, channel surfing on TV, I saw a ceremony inducting new officers into the police, and the candidates sat and stood and spoke, unsmilingly, in perfect unison. This struck me as somehow related to the stiff formalism of Byzantium."

Such circumstantial linkages occur all the time in life, and artists can often use them to make something brand-new out of something ages old. Thus for Taylor, in the beginning there was the word, and now there is "The Word."

ever pulled in my life in Hollywood." That may not be far from the truth.

At first, not even his agent, Arnold Rifkin, would back him.

Ezsterhas' wife Naomi, who was involved in the making of the film from its earliest stages, recalls, "(Rifkin) said 'I think you should put this in a draw and forget about it because it's bad for your career and it's bad for my career. You don't want to make this movie.'" Rifkin refused to comment.

Ever persistent, Ezsterhas was determined to make a go of his film, later marketed as "The movie Hollywood doesn't want you to see." He and producer Ben Myron made hundreds of copies of the script, distributing them to everyone.

"If we sent this to enough people, it couldn't be stopped," Ezsterhas says. It seems to have paid off, because industry response was overwhelmingly positive.

Once the town's verdict came in, the screenwriter's agent became committed to making the movie happen. Incidentally, Ezsterhas now has a new agent.

"There was no shortage of people wanting to be in the film," Myron says. "People were calling almost on a daily basis saying 'I want to be in the film,'"

The film features a diverse cast, including Coolio, Chuck D and Sandra Bernhard. And the list of cameos looks like the guest list to a congressional funeral. Most notable are Sylvester Stallone, Jackie Chan and Whoopi Goldberg, who play themselves. Subtitles identify them as the rocket scientist, the linguist and the Ted Danson fan, respectively. Even Lt. Gov. Gray Davis agreed to shoot a cameo, although it was ultimately left on the cutting room floor.

> (The director) left because of a disagreement ... with the littlest of little guys ... the screenwriter.

If anybody was going to get this movie made his own way, it was Ezsterhas. In an industry where screenwriters are typically dismissed after selling off the rights to their initial work, only to hope the producers and directors will portray it the way they would have it portrayed, Ezsterhas has clout. He is one of the most outspoken – and highly paid – screenwriters around.

In fact, when he and director Arthur Hiller disagreed about the final editing, the studio backed the screenwriter over the director.

"That's virtually unheard of in Hollywood," says Stephen Farber, moderator of the UCLA Extension class "Contemporary Films and Filmmakers."

Hiller chose to walk out of film.

That's right, Ezsterhas' film about a Smithee film is, in fact, a Smithee film. But it wasn't the producers and studio execs who forced him out.

Hiller left because of a disagreement with the man who is supposed to be the littlest of little guys in Hollywood – the screenwriter.

Ezsterhas did choose to include in the final edit, which was left to his discretion, what turns out to be the most ironic scene in the movie.

It is a scene in which both Ezsterhas and Hiller make cameos, and Hiller tells Ezsterhas, "The last thing any director needs is you of all people to stick up for us."

FILM: "An Alan Smithee Film: Burn Hollywood Burn" opens in theaters on Friday.

concentrated on the music. His smiles, giggles and good mood quickly brought the crowd up to his cheerful level, and strangers were embracing each other even before Common Sense finished the first song of their set, a pumping number called "In Your Eyes."

> The band's tight horn section and talented musicianship made the songs memorable.

The band paid homage to their influences, incorporating cover tunes throughout almost half of the entire set.

Common Sense did them justice. Their rendition of "Sexual Healing" stayed loyal to the tempo and sound of the original, and if Marvin Gaye could have attended the show he would have been more than pleased with the result. Hernandez's voice provided a pleasant surprise as he crooned like a pro in want of a little lovin'.

Shortly after, keyboardist Jai Vatuk stepped over to guitar and showed his mettle when the band cranked out a rocking cover of Jimi Hendrix's "Hey Joe," with drummer Chuck Morris dazzling the crowd with a five-minute solo in the middle of the song. Under alternating flashes of blinding white-hot and bright blue lights, Morris looked like some kind of space alien pounding away at the control panel of his rocket ship.

Later, Common Sense lofted the crowd to another plateau with their cover of the Steve Miller Band's "Fly Like an Eagle."

"We've been playing this song for years," Hernandez said.

"All the guys had command of their instruments ... they sounded solid and they sounded tight," said Jason Bonilla, a fourth-year UCLA English student. "If you wanted to include them in some genre, I think they could be categorized with Sublime and 311."

Another group of fans stood in back of the crowd and raised their arms in victory, clapping like a bunch of crazies.

By the end of their set, rowdy applause and fervent cheering from the crowd prompted the band to play a 20-minute encore set. Common Sense took this time to tell their story in one particular song, referring back to their roots in "south-central Laguna." They included three more tunes, including a cover of Bob Marley's anthematic "Get Up, Stand Up," which had the crowd going home in high spirits.

A SYMPOSIUM:
The Environment of Southern California in the 20th and 21st Centuries
Tuesday, March 3, 1998
UCLA Faculty Center
The Institute of the Environment (IoE) invites you to attend a one day symposium on critical aspects of our Southern California environment. By informing students, faculty, concerned citizens, business leaders, and government officials about the environmental legacy of the 20th century, this conference might help us to cope intelligently with practical decisions, trends and opportunities during the coming years. Participants will have the chance to meet and talk informally with the speakers and with each other at lunch and at a reception following the meeting as well as at "coffee" breaks during the morning and afternoon sessions.
PRESENTERS INCLUDE:

NANKING

back, for, like the Holocaust, the cultural tensions that allowed the the invasion of Nanking to happen were centuries in the making.

Having set the stage, Chang moves next to graphic descriptions of the violence inflicted upon the Chinese people by Japanese troops. One of many examples:

"Death by Dogs: One diabolical means of torture was to bury victims to their waist and watch them get ripped apart by German shepherds. Witnesses saw Japanese soldiers strip a victim naked and direct German shepherds to bite the sensitive areas of his body. The dogs not only ripped open his belly but jerked out his intestines along the ground for a distance."

Stories like this are extremely powerful by themselves and less skilled authors will tend to rely too much on them to carry their book. To Chang's credit, she offers enough examples to convey the story she is telling without going overboard.

Still following the basic structure of most Holocaust narratives, Chang moves on to what might be described as the rescue. The German Holocaust was so immense that there was no large-scale rescue prior to the end of World War II, only isolated instances of human lives being saved thanks to the efforts of individuals like Oskar Schindler and Raoul Wallenberg, who saved, respectively 1,200 and 100,000 Jewish people from the German concentration camps.

Since the Japanese invasion of Nanking affected fewer people and was geographically condensed, there was a bona fide rescue. The successful effort to establish a Nanking Safety Zone was led by one John Rabe, an avowed member of the Nazi party. Not surprisingly, Chang makes the obvious connection to Oskar Schindler, but does nothing with it.

More distressingly, she does not do much to explore the character of John Rabe and to explain the complexities of a man who was a white supremacist, and yet was willing to risk arrest and death to save the lives of Chinese people.

The Holocaust narrative structure is not surprising, for it works well for this kind of history. It allows the details, which are so emotionally affecting, to speak for themselves, with a minimum of interference from the author.

However, Chang breaks from this format in two interesting ways. First, most stories like this are told from the point of view of the victim, presumably under the assumption that the guilty parties are not worthy of any more historical examination than is necessary to label them the "bad guy" and move on. Chang, however, makes an effort to tell the story from multiple points of view, including that of the aggressors. This adds much more complexity to the story.

The second aspect that distinguishes Chang's account is her continuance of the story to the present day, arguing that a "Second Rape of Nanking" has occurred, with the Japanese government still refusing to accept responsibility for the crimes committed in China between 1931 and 1945. Some readers might take objection to this part of the book, by equating the lapse in historical memory with the event itself she necessarily cheapens the significance of the actual event. Nonetheless, the point is an interesting one and provides for thought.

The great weakness of this book is its handling of the "other" Holocaust. It is tempting to draw the connection between the rape of

Nanking and the German Holocaust, because the two events involved mass destruction and happened at essentially the same time. But there are key differences that should be considered: the German Holocaust lasted much longer, was supported by a much larger number of people and resulted in 20 times as many deaths.

However, if the comparison between the Holocaust and the rape of Nanking had to be drawn, Chang should have done so much more fully, using the two together as a case study to determine how these things happen and more importantly, how they can be avoided in the future. If she had done so, the book would have been not only a service to those whose anguish has been forgotten but to the rest of humanity as well.

MARCEAU

a child," Marceau says. "They were mimes. The talkies did not exist, so, it was slapstick and pantomime. Mime was a very strong art form in movies then."

As for his instant success in America, Marceau credits it to the fact that most people had been unfamiliar with pantomime and were fascinated with how different it was from the usual singing and dancing they had seen before on the stage.

"The difference between mime from dance is that in dance, you are bound by music and movement," Marceau says. "Mime is bound by silence. We use music too, but our gestures are not bound by musical form. We express comedy and tragedy of man without words. You have to be an actor to be a mime."

Now Marceau's puts his expertise in modern mime to use in his Paris International School of Mimedrama where students come from over 20 nations to study with the renowned artist. He hopes that with his school, he can turn on future generations to the beauty of silent acting.

"Since I brought mime to America, there have been good mimes and bad mimes," Marceau says. "There are many students who worked with me and it is now a stronger art form. When I started for the first time, it was so new, but now everybody knows Marcel Marceau."

And even though Marceau has been entertaining audiences with the antics of BIP for almost 50 years, he has no plans to stop touring and teaching his craft. And although he is over 70 years old, he proudly boasts that he still maintains the spirit and body of his youth.

"You must understand that you are all obsessed by age," Marceau says. "Everybody's obsessed by age. I have kept the same body of 30 years ago. When you see the show in Los Angeles, you will see that I speak the truth."

Marceau is excited about bringing his unique program to Los Angeles and introducing future generations to this older art of pantomime.

"I'm sure the young people will be moved," Marceau says. "It raises their imagination and it is wonderful. They have discovered exactly why their parents told them they should see Marcel Marceau.

"Have I become a legend? It's possible. The young people who have never seen my work (before) are speechless. It's a discovery for them and there's the same excitement that was there when I first arrived in America. It's a wonderful thrill for me. It's very good to come back."

PANTOMIME: Marcel Marceau performs Saturday at 8 p.m. at the Wiltern Theatre. Tickets are $30 to $50. For more information, call (213) 380-5005.

NETWORK EVENT THEATER®

Congratulations to Our 15 Senior Spotlights!

The Senior Spotlight Award was developed to recognize distinguished UCLA seniors. These talented students are chosen from a large number of senior applicants, each of which has excelled in many areas during their career at UCLA. Each year these "spotlighted" graduates receive a special page in their honor in the senior section of the Bruinlife Yearbook. This special recognition of outstanding seniors is unique to Bruinlife and is only one of the many interesting ways UCLA and its students are captured in the yearbook.

Bruinlife Yearbook would like to congratulate the 15 winners of the Senior Spotlight Award.

We would also like to thank all who expressed interest and took the time to apply.

Good luck and continued success in your future endeavors.

Today, Bruinlife would like to recognize Jennifer Hertz for her outstanding achievements. Read about her, along with these fourteen other Senior Spotlights, only in this year's Bruinlife Yearbook:

How to Write an Effective Ad
- Start your ad with the merchandise you are selling. This makes it easier for readers to quickly scan the ads and locate your items.
- Always include the price of your item. Many classified readers simply do not respond to ads without prices.
- Avoid abbreviations—make you ad easy for readers to understand.
- Place yourself in the reader's position, ask what you would like to know about the merchandise, and include that in the ad. Include such information as brand names, colors and other specific descriptions.

The ASUCLA Communications Board fully supports the University of California's policy on nondiscrimination, so medium shall accept advertisements which present persons of any origin, race, sex, or sexual orientation in a demeaning way or imply that they are limited to positions, capabilities, roles, or status in society. Neither the Daily Bruin nor the the ASUCLA Communications Board has investigated any of the services advertised or the advertisements represented in this issue. Any person believing that an advertisement in this issue violated the Board's policy on nondiscrimination stated herein should communicate complaints in writing to the Business Manager, Daily Bruin, 118 Kerckhoff Hall, 308 Westwood Plaza, Los Angeles, CA 90024. TODAY'S CROSSWORD PUZZLE

Good morning sunshine. Well today it looks more like good afternoon sleepy head! This particular person of privilege seems to be having some trouble with her morning routine. The night before she demonstrated her social graces with her fellow socialites by shmoozing (and boozing) at an informal social gathering of some of the most prominent pupils on campus. However, it looks like she's going to have a hard time making it to her social studies lecture on time. Not to say that she has no class, but the one she has today will suffer due to her so called socializing. Etiquette, dignity, exquisite manners, and all other amenities have been lost in a morning of misery that started the first time the alarm went off (nine or ten slaps of the snooze button earlier). Is she fit for society? Sure she is. Is she a social outcast? No, of course not! But she might suffer from a common social disease. Some people feel that they have to get fall down blotto to have a good time. But more often then not they ask themselves the age old question: "why did I drink so much?" Or they declare the ultimate in social statements: "I'll never do that again!" The cure to this oh so common ailment is quite simple, don't over-do it dumb ass! Most UCLA students drink four or less when they party. Some don't drink at all. So be class conscious! When you've done 4, you're done.

of the eighth inning, which was followed by relief pitcher Bobby Roe's miscue on a sacrifice bunt. Both runners, who could have been the the second and third outs, went on to score, as well as the following hitter, who got on base via a walk. Another walk would score in the ninth inning.

Head coach Gary Adams recalled Atkins' play as one of the key points in the game: "I think he could have made the play," Adams said. "It wasn't an easy choice to call that and error or a hit. On the bench, half of us were signalling error, and the other said it was a hit. If he handled the ball, he would have gotten the guy out at first because of his great arm."

UCLA rides a four-game losing streak into a big weekend against No. 2 USC.

"The challenge is just beginning," Beringhele said. "The team needs to keep believing in themselves and stick together."

Maybe fans will unglue themselves from television sets and get out to see them play.

that a young woman must either: (1) have a college degree, (2) completed her college eligibility, or (3) be 22 years of age.

Gee, what are those guys smokin', huh?

In a special article for ESPN SportsZone, Niesha compared the issue to Roe v. Wade, stating that "This is a simple issue of a women having the right to make a choice and not having to abide by rules that need not apply."

It's a basic question of equality, she claims. Men can do something that women cannot.

Let's not convene the Supreme Court on this one quite yet, OK, Niesha?

Now, I'm not even going to get into the "Rah-Rah, College is a Fun and Life-Changing Experience" argument that usually results from any discussion about leaving early for the pros. I don't need to.

The bottom line is that women's professional basketball is not currently in the same position as the NBA. It may not be fair, Niesha, but that's the way it is.

To start, let's look at the money involved.

According to the WNBA's sliding pay scale, the top three picks in each year's draft receive $37,500 per season, while those in the fourth round take home $15,000.

How are women, as you said, going to "provide more financial security for (their) children" (one of the reasons you offered for leaving early) on 15 grand, minus taxes? The answer is that they won't without another job. And what kind of job can someone without a college degree, whose main skill is putting a ball through a hole, get? Does the expression, "Would you like fries with that?" ring a bell, Niesha?

The American Basketball League is more generous, with an average salary of $80,000; good money. But would it be enough to live off of for the rest of your life should you blow out a knee? Without a college degree, it might have to be.

Added to that is the serious possibility that those paychecks may come screeching to a halt very soon: it's hardly unthinkable at this point that one or both of the leagues could fold in the next few years.

The ABL, widely considered the better and more talent-rich of the two, lost $5 million dollars last year, according to an article in the Miami Sun-Sentinel. This was largely the result of a paltry 3,536 average attendance, with only 4,500 showing up for playoff games (in comparison, UCLA men's basketball has drawn about 10,500 this year).

In other words, the league is struggling to survive, and the WNBA isn't doing much better. At this point, they need polished players who come in ready to contribute from the get-go.

They simply cannot afford the waiting period usually necessary for younger talent to reach its potential. They don't need Jermaine O'Neal (apparently a Niesha favorite); they need Tim Duncan.

Players that might be great in five years don't help the leagues if they fold in the meantime.

And if they both folded, where would that leave you, Niesha?

Equality is wonderful; it's the ideal that we as a society should strive for. But is the behavior of the men and society's treatment of them really something worth copying, in this case?

According to a weekly online diary written by Niesha, that is what's happening. High school girls are starting to get the same treatment as the boys: national media attention at age 15, hype and awards based on promise rather than accomplishment, and gifts/perks unavailable to the average student.

This week she wrote about getting free tickets to the NBA All-Star game "from a source which shall remain nameless." What's next, Ford Broncos and marijuana suspensions?

Does equality mean that women need to blindly make the same mistakes the men do?

For every Stephon Marbury (another of Niesha's favorites, and a player who shares her N.Y. and G. Tech roots), who leaves early for the fame and riches of the NBA, there are two Scotty Thurmonds.

Remember him? Scotty was the high-scoring shooting guard who, along with Corliss Williamson, lead Arkansas to the a national championship in '93-'94 and the NCAA final the next year. Then, he gave up his final year of eligibility, hired an agent (effectively burning his college bridges) and opted for the NBA draft.

Don't bother scanning the box scores for Scotty; you won't find him. Passed over by all 29 NBA teams (even the first-year Raptors and Grizzlies who just needed warm bodies), he slunk off to the CBA, minus the millions he had envisioned.

I think he's still there; that is, if he hasn't been banished to Europe or to slinging Slurpies at a 7-Eleven somewhere. Thank you, Scotty. Come again.

If you don't remember Scotty Thurmand, how about Victor Page? Or Reshard Griffith? Or hundreds of others?

With her demands, Niesha is threatening to make the same mess for herself and women's basketball that the men now wish they could get out of.

You know, it's funny that the address for her weekly diary is www.gettingreal.com, because that is exactly what Niesha needs to do.

thing."

The conference issued a statement Wednesday saying the officials' decision not to call goaltending was "consistent with the most recent interpretation" of the rule.

Knight walked over to check on Recker, who was still lying on the floor, and Valentine gave him a second technical, an automatic ejection. Knight then flew into a rage and received the third technical.

"When I went out on the floor and walked toward Luke on the floor, my only comment was, 'I have an injured player there.' Period," Knight said. "I have every right to go out on the floor when there's an injured player on the floor.

"This, and that guy (Valentine), is the greatest travesty I've ever seen in basketball in 33 years as a college head coach," Knight said. "That goes beyond anything that's even Ripken of UCLA basketball," head coach Steve Lavin said – alluding to the sports world's ultimate iron man. "What I mean by that is it's his toughness and durability over his career which has made him so valuable to the program."

There was just never a reason for him to be benched.

Disciplinary problems? Not for the son of a parole officer. Injuries? Bailey is as well conditioned as any athlete on the floor. Lack of effort? The coaches say he gives it his all every time he's on the court.

That's what made Wednesday's benching against USC so surprising.

Bailey was removed from the starting lineup because he lost both his temper and his aggressiveness in the practice prior to the Bruins' 82-75 overtime win at the Sports Arena.

"He has set a very high level of expectation, and he wasn't living up to it," Lavin said. "He wasn't practicing at a high enough intensity level, and my job as coach is to hold him accountable to that level."

There were no arguments from Bailey. In fact, he knew that he deserved to get kicked out of practice for the first time in his life as well as the subsequent benching.

"It was a little out of character," Bailey said. "I wasn't practicing like Toby Bailey."

The suspension came at the end of a week that would rank among the worst of Bailey's UCLA career.

On Feb. 12, Bailey finished off a 7-for-19 shooting night (including 0-for-6 from three-point range) by committing two turnovers in the final minute of the Bruins' 84-81 loss to Stanford.

With six seconds left and UCLA trailing by two, Bailey fell in the key with the ball, effectively ending any chance for a Bruin victory.

"That Stanford game took a lot out of me after falling down," he said. "I was thinking about that every night when I was going to sleep."

It didn't get any better two days later. Though UCLA beat California, 87-84, Bailey shot 2-of-9 from the field, got season-low marks with seven points and two rebounds, while committing a season-high eight turnovers.

"That's when I sensed he was struggling – the California game," Lavin game. "I could tell he was down about the Cal and Stanford games. He's a competitor, and because he's a senior I think he may have been pressing a little bit in trying to step up his game."

Bailey concurs.

> "I think Toby has done (a great job) this year by sacrificing his position. He is turning into a very unselfish player."
> Kris Johnson
> Senior forward

"I was just mentally drained," he said. "I think that Stanford game took a lot out of me after slipping. I was thinking about that every night going to sleep. I think it took (the benching) and doing something a little bit out of my character and I just blew off a little steam.

"It has definitely been frustrating. We were losing games that we should have won, and I'm just trying to keep a positive attitude."

When Bailey finally did enter the USC game about five minutes in, he never came out and eventually led the Bruins to their comeback victory in overtime.

Though shooting poorly for most of the game, he scored the Bruins' final four points to send the game into the extra period, then added four more points, three rebounds and two assists to seal the win.

Then, in the blowout loss against Duke, while shooting poorly from the field once against (5-of-16), he lead all players with nine rebounds – including seven offensive boards.

In his past four games, he has made only 19 of 61 field goal attempts – but since the suspension, his attitude and other aspects of his game have improved.

"In the USC game he missed his shots," Lavin said. "But I was pleased with his aggressiveness and his rebounding. And in the Duke game, his shots weren't going in, but what I was pleased with was the way he rebounded the ball and ran the floor – doing the things to help us win – other than just shooting the ball."

And while, Bailey's reputation is built on his scoring. – if his shots don't fall, many consider him a disappointment – those other aspects often get lost.

Perhaps the high expectations stem from Bailey's 26 points in the NCAA championship game three years ago. Since then he has only surpassed that point total once, and has averaged "only" 13.9 points per game.

"I think people have assumed that if I get 26 points in the championship game, I'm supposed to get 26 points every game," he said. "It just doesn't happen. Not at UCLA, there are too many good players to spread the ball around to.

"I just got more solid all around, I'm actually more consistent now. I might not score 26 points a game, but I'll get five, six, seven boards a game."

Beyond ranking among the Bruin career leaders in points (10th with 1,695) and three-pointers, he is among the top 10 in assists (7th with 431), is only being out-rebounded this year by J. R. Henderson, and if they somehow make it to the Final Four, Bailey will have played in more games than any Bruin in school history.

But, he's missed 17 of his last 20 three-pointers, and his field goal percentage has fallen from last year; and thus, those outside the "Bruin basketball family" say he is struggling.

"I think that's the standard that a lot of people hold to Toby Bailey – is that he is superhuman and that he is an invincible person," senior forward Kris Johnson said. "But, he's a human being. He's done very well dealing with it – he's been dealing with a lot of things.

"It's like the USC game where he was missing a lot of shots and the crowd was on him, but he stayed in the game and made some key plays down the stretch to bring us back into the game and win it."

But, despite the rebounds, assists and three-pointers, perhaps Bailey's most important asset is his stability, and that is why last Wednesday's punishment was so important in the scope of the season – to get Bailey refocused.

When Johnson and Jelani McCoy were suspended earlier in the season, Bailey was there to take over a leadership role, and when McCoy left the team last week, Bailey took more responsibility on his shoulders.

Due to the ever-changing roster, Bailey has found himself at point guard, shooting guard, and both small forward and power forward.

"This year he has been stepping up – given the fact that I was suspended," Johnson said. "We all had big ridiculous ... This was absolutely, totally uncalled for. Just beyond belief."

Recker injured a rib and underwent further treatment by team trainer Tim Garl Wednesday. His status is unclear for Saturday's game at Iowa, the Hoosiers' regular-season finale.

Kruger said he didn't see what happened during Knight's confrontation with Valentine.

"We were huddled and talking about what we want to do, and we don't have much control over anything else," Kruger said. "I wasn't paying a lot of attention to it. I was more concerned about talking to the players.

Three years ago, Knight was reprimanded and fined $30,000 for a profane outburst at an NCAA tournament news conference. In 1993, he was suspended for one game after he kicked his son – a member of the Hoosiers – and responded with an obscenity when fans booed. He was reprimanded by the university in 1987 for not allowing his team to finish an exhibition game against the Soviet Union.

Knight also was reprimanded, and the university was fined $10,000 by the NCAA after he banged his fist on the scorer's table during a 1987 NCAA tourney game. In 1985, he was suspended by the Big Ten for one game for throwing a chair across the court.

Hershiser winds up for fastball recovery

PITCHER: Player looks to regain control of skills with return to old coach

By Dennis Georgatos
The Associated Press

SCOTTSDALE, Ariz. — At 39 and heading into a 16th big league season, Orel Hershiser's formula for success starts with a return to the basics.

Hershiser, a free agent acquisition by the San Francisco Giants, said that he strayed from his original pitching style while in Cleveland the past three years.

He believes his reunion with Giants pitching coach Ron Perranoski holds the key to rediscovering his old delivery and perhaps even adding velocity and sharper movement to his sinker and curve ball.

Perranoski first worked with Hershiser in the minor leagues in 1979, and they spent 12 years together with the Los Angeles Dodgers.

Hershiser became a dominating pitcher while they were both with the Dodgers, capped by a phenomenal 1988 season in which he pitched a record 59 straight scoreless innings and won the NL Cy Young Award and the World Series MVP. In 1990, Hershiser underwent reconstructive shoulder surgery and completed a longshot return to the game the next season, also under the guidance of Perranoski.

"(Pitching coach) Mark Wiley did a good job in Cleveland, but he never saw me pre-surgery," Hershiser said. "Ron saw me pre-surgery and was my coach to bring me back from surgery, pitching-wise. If anybody knows my delivery and the way my pitches should react when I was successful, Perry's the guy."

It didn't take Perranoski long to determine that Hershiser had slightly changed his throwing motion and release point. The result that was his fabled sinker wasn't breaking down as sharply as it had in the past and his curve ball flattened out a bit.

"Maybe he was doing it unconsciously, but his arm was out and away from his head a little bit too much, and he was arching his back a little too much," Perranoski said. "What we're doing now is just getting his arm position to where the ball is going to react the way we want it to."

> "It'll be nice to be a complete player ... and do all that."
> Orel Hershiser
> Giants pitcher

Hershiser, fifth among active pitchers with 179 career wins, has spent the past week in spring training getting his pitching delivery down. He believes the changes will increase the speed and movement on his breaking pitches, which he said dropped 2-3 mph to the mid-80s last year.

"Hopefully this year I'm going to make it go up a little bit because Perry already found a couple things in my delivery that have helped my consistency," Hershiser said. "Maybe I've got a chance to make it go up again. It's already helped me a lot."

Hershiser, who signed a one-year, $3.45 million contract with an option for 1999, also said he could benefit from returning the National League. He spent three years in the AL with Cleveland, going 45-21, including a 14-6 record with a 4.47 ERA last season.

"I think it's a little more of a pitcher's league," Hershiser said. "The games are lower scoring, and you get to face the other pitcher. I think it's a tad more of a thinking man's league, not quite the brawn of the American League, where you're kind of waiting for the three-run homer.

"There's more looking for run production. It'll be nice to be a complete player, to be able to handle the bat, get the runners over, run the bases and do all that."

The right-handed Hershiser is expected to be slotted in the No. 2 spot in the Giants' rotation, between left-handers Shawn Estes and Kirk Rueter.

As for how much longer he plans to pitch, Hershiser said he's not sure.

"Who knows where I am in my career?" he said. "I don't take it for granted that I'm going to pitch forever, but I also don't think of it as, 'This is my last year for sure or next year will be.'

"Pretty much after your 35th birthday, everybody starts to think this is going to be his last year. Anytime you go into a little slump or have a little injury, everybody thinks that's the beginning of the end. Well, here I am at 39, and we're still going."

BAILEY

aspirations and dreams for this year, but after me and (McCoy) got suspended, Toby was kind of disappointed in us, and I think he and Henderson did a great job as serving as leaders.

"I think Toby has done that this year by sacrificing his position. He is turning into a very unselfish player."

In essence, he has served as the glue that has kept the team together.

As a result, if the Bruins lose Bailey's concentration and composure again, whatever hope UCLA has of making a tourney run, would be wiped away. And Bailey knows it.

"We've set our goals to get to the Final Four again, and we have our work cut out for us," he said. "But, if we do everything right, I definitely feel that we could get back to the Final Four."

The chances of ending his career the same way he started it – with a national title – may be slim, but one thing remains for sure.

Come tourney time, if Bailey is sitting out at tip-off, any wake-up call would be much too late.

And the nightmare season would only continue. But for just one more game.

CALIFORNIA SPORTS

Lakers 96, Pacers 89

Shaquille O'Neal scored 24 points, and Eddie Jones and Derek Fisher had 20 apiece as the Los Angeles Lakers defeated the Indiana Pacers 96-89 Wednesday night.

The Pacers, who trailed nearly the entire game, cut an 11-point deficit to four with 2:27 left. But Indiana couldn't get any closer, and Fisher's 21-footer with 59 seconds remaining clinched the victory for the Lakers.

Rik Smits led Indiana with 19 points. Mark Jackson added 18, and Dale Davis had 14 points and 16 rebounds.

Fisher's basket with 6:53 gave Los Angeles an 86-75 lead with 6:53 remaining in the game. Jackson then had seven points, a steal and an assist as Indiana pulled within 90-86.

The Pacers shot only 24 percent from the field in the opening period, then missed its first seven shots of the second quarter.

Clippers 117, Sixers 108

Eric Piatkowski scored 24 of his career-high 27 points in the second half as the Los Angeles Clippers beat the Philadelphia 76ers 117-108 Wednesday night to end a seven-game losing streak.

Rookie Maurice Taylor scored 20 points for the Clippers, and Isaac Austin had 19 points and 12 rebounds despite a sprained ankle.

Bill Fitch of the Clippers became the second-winningest coach in NBA history with his 939th career victory. Fitch, who moved past Red Auerbach on the list, trails all-time leader Lenny Wilkens of the Hawks by 164 wins.

Derrick Coleman tied a season-high with 25 points for the Sixers, who lost their fifth straight at the Sports Arena and failed in their bid to win three consecutive road games for the first time since 1994.

Kings 1, Red Wings 1, tie

Los Angeles goaltender Stephane Fiset stopped 28 shots as the Kings and Detroit Red Wings skated to a 1-1 tie Wednesday night in their first game after the Olympic break.

Vladimir Tsyplakov scored on the Kings' first shot following the 17-day break, but Los Angeles couldn't beat Detroit goalie Chris Osgood again. Osgood, unbeaten in his last 29 overtime games, made 16 saves.

Brent Gilchrist scored for the Red Wings, who have tied all 13 of their overtime games this season.

Detroit was without Steve Yzerman and Brendan Shanahan, who returned Monday from playing on Canada's Olympic team in Nagano, Japan. They were given a couple of extra days to recover from jet lag and will probably return for the Red Wings' next game Friday against Florida.

Canucks 5, Ducks 2

Peter Zezel had a goal and two assists, giving him six points in three games since joining Vancouver, to lead the Canucks to a 5-2 win over the injury-riddled Anaheim Mighty Ducks on Wednesday night.

Marcus Naslund added a goal and two assists as the Canucks won for the fifth time in six outings. Zezel now has two goals and four assists since Vancouver acquired him for a fifth-round draft pick from New Jersey earlier this month.

The Canucks, who remained in the Western Conference basement one point behind the idle Calgary Flames, took control when rookie Mattias Ohlund and Brad May, another newcomer, scored to give Vancouver a 2-0 lead before the game was nine minutes old.

COACH: Indiana legend receives more criticism for poor handling of disagreements with referees

By Steve Herman
The Associated Press

BLOOMINGTON, Ind. – One night his team is humiliated, losing by 48 points. Three nights later, he is ejected during a loss at home, then gives a scathing critique of the referees.

Indiana coach Bob Knight's latest outburst is now under review by the Big Ten office.

The conference said Wednesday it has begun studying the Indiana-Illinois game in which Knight received three technical fouls and called the officiating, specifically that of Ted Valentine, the "greatest travesty" he has ever seen as a college basketball coach.

"We are aware of those comments," Big Ten commissioner Jim Delany said Wednesday. "I think what we'll probably do is issue a statement about the game as a whole."

Delany pointed to the league's various rules concerning coaches and unsportsmanlike conduct: crowd incitement and undue criticism of coaches, schools, players or officials.

"So we've got four or five different provisions that could be applicable," Delany said.

The Hoosiers lost 82-72 to No. 22 Illinois on Tuesday night, three days after they were routed 112-64 by Michigan for Knight's second-worst loss since he came to Indiana.

On Tuesday night, when asked if he expected to be disciplined for his comments – as he has in the past – Knight said, "I don't know."

Illinois coach Lon Kruger said that an intense game can trigger an episode of this kind.

"I think early the officials were trying to keep some flow and call some things that I think need to be called more often in the league," he said. "I think the game has gotten to the point where it's too physical and not being played by the rules as intended."

Knight received one technical foul in the first half. He was ejected after picking up his second and third technicals with 9:37 to go.

Freshman Luke Recker was knocked hard to the floor, and Knight thought Recker's shot should have counted as a basket because of goaltending. But the officials ruled no goaltending because Illinois' Sergio McClain pulled the rim, for which he was assessed a technical, and they could not assume the ball would have gone in.

"Well, that's the most ridiculous statement I've ever heard because you can't assume that any goaltend shot is going to be good," Knight said. "If the ball is on its downward flight and it's interfered with, it's a goaltend. You don't assume it's going to be good, missed, not hit the rim, or any-

MEN'S SOCCER

The UCLA men's soccer team, after an incredible NCAA 1997 championship title season, has nabbed one of the top recruits in the United States, National Team member Ryan Futagaki.

Futagaki, a 5-foot-5-inch midfielder from Fountain Valley High School, is a member of UCLA head coach Sigi Schmid's U.S. Under-20 National Team pool.

At Fountain Valley, he was a two-time All-CIF selection who twice led his team to the CIF Division I title game. In 1996-97, after scoring 15 goals and 22 assists, he was named first-team all-league for the third consecutive year, as well as first-team all-county by the Los Angeles Times and Orange County Register.

Anteaters strike up on-court challenge

VOLLEYBALL: With big hitters, UC Irvine could threaten powerful UCLA

By Grace Wen
Daily Bruin Staff

What a difference a year can make.

The UC Irvine men's volleyball team already has more wins this season than it did all of last year.

The Anteaters finished tied for last in the Mountain Division of the MPSF conference. This year Irvine is tied with BYU for third behind UCLA and Pepperdine.

Second-year UCI head coach Charlie Brande attributes the vast improvement to a good recruiting class and returners who are more competitive than before.

UC Irvine (8-3, 5-3)

MARK DITTMER/Daily Bruin

"Last year when we played, I didn't feel we stepped up and played very competitively," Brande said. "I think this year's group will be much much more competitive. It'll be tough for us to win a game there, but we'll be much much more competitive."

Although the Anteaters' four-match winning streak was broken last Saturday by Santa Barbara, UCI has a loaded offense that has keyed them to wins over USC and UCSB.

"They have three outside hitters coming back, and they're all getting about five kills per game," UCLA head coach Al Scates said. "The other two players don't get set very much. This is a problem because you can't key on three players."

UCLA's main focus, however, will be on Cory Weber. The senior middle blocker has been the Anteaters go-to-guy. Weber averages 6.8 kills a game and is hitting .426 for the year.

"What's alarming about it is that he's hitting .426 and getting 6.5 kills per game," Scates said. "This is big. This is a big problem. Anybody who gets that many sets and hits for that kind of average (has got to be the reason)."

Weber's performance along with outside hitters Donnie Rafter and Mike Rupp will keep the Bruins on their toes tonight.

"We're going to have to read and react a little more than usual," Scates said. "Play a pretty straight up honest defense cause they have three people they can go to."

UCLA, on the other hand, has an offense in which it can go to five different people. In addition, the Bruin lineups have been known to change yet still produce wins.

Despite the improved season for Irvine, Brande realizes that a formidable challenge lies ahead of them.

"UCLA is extremely well-coached and extremely talented," Brande said. "We hope to get there and give them some kind of a battle.

"I think serving will be a tremendous factor. If we don't serve tough and we don't receive well it's going to be very hard for us to compete."

M. GYMNASTICS BRIEFS

Gymnastics fans will have the opportunity to watch gymnasts from all over the world compete this week as the UCLA Men's Gymnastics Club co-hosts the 7th annual UCLA Peter Vidmar Collegiate Invite, with Broadway Gymnastics School beginning tonight at 7:30 p.m. in the John Wooden Center.

The Invite is four days in length and will feature different gymnasts between the ages of 7 to 26, who come from 92 clubs from 18 states and 6 countries.

The Bruins will compete tonight against the 1997 defending champions UC Berkeley, Arizona State, Brigham Young University, Stanford, and UC Santa Barbara.

Following the collegiate competition, Friday and Saturday will be devoted to a Special Olympics session and teams from Mexico, Australia, New Zealand, Canada, Brazil and Armenia.

On Saturday at 5 p.m. over 19 elite athletes from Mexico and Australia will compete against a USA Club All-Star Team.

In addition to giving over 700 gymnasts a chance to compete, all proceeds raised at the Invite will be donated to the Broadway Gymnastics Foundation for Scholarships for financially disadvantaged boys and girls team programs.

The Toby constant

In spite of ups and downs in game play, Toby Bailey stands as a guiding leader and player who keeps the team together

JAMIE SCANLON-JACOBS/Daily Bruin

If the Bruins make it to the Final Four, Toby Bailey will break the record for number of career games played for UCLA.

By Brent Boyd
Daily Bruin Staff

Toby Bailey has seen a little bit of everything in his four-year career as a Bruin – everything, that is, except stability.

In his freshman season he helped win a national championship, and the next year he played a key role in the first-round loss to Princeton.

He's played four different positions throughout his career – under the watchful eyes of two vastly different head coaches.

At times he has played phenomenally. And at other times he has been horrible.

But one thing has remained constant for Bailey. He has always played, and he has always started. Always.

Until last Wednesday.

For the first time in 100 games, the Bruins took the court without their iron man.

For the first time since Feb. 21, 1995, Bailey started the game sitting down.

And though it may have ruined an impressive streak, at the same time it may have saved the season – both for Bailey and the team.

"I think not starting that game was a wake-up call," the 6-foot-5-inch senior guard said. "It made me look at the game from a different perspective. I know that at the game I was sitting on the bench watching them play, and I wanted to be out there."

ADAM BROWN/Daily Bruin

It had always been a foregone conclusion that when the game started, Bailey would be on the floor – like he will be tonight when the Bruins (20-6, 10-4 Pac-10) take on Washington State (9-17, 2-13) at Friel Court in Pullman, Wash.

He always found a way to avoid the game of musical chairs that the rest of the UCLA starting lineup had become.

He and Earl Watson were the only players to start every game this year. Last year only Bailey and Charles O'Bannon started every contest, and in his sophomore year only he and Jelani McCoy began each game on the court.

But perhaps more importantly, over that time span he has averaged over 35 minutes a game – far and away more than any other Bruin. And with a team that has only five players that are proven contributors, every extra minute becomes extremely important.

Heroic Niesha wants to be like Mike. And Stephon. And maybe even Kobe.

Not even enrolled yet at Georgia Tech, she wants to leave college early, or at least have that choice. She would even like to be able to skip college all together.

That is why she and her family are considering suing the WNBA, one of the two women's pro leagues.

You see, the leagues have this crazy idea that they want their players to be well-rounded young women and polished players before turning pro. To that end, they have established minimum requirements

Is the behavior of the men and society's treatment of them really something worth copying in this case?

BASEBALL: Steady offense not enough to overcome last-minute mistakes

By Kristina Wilcox
Daily Bruin Staff

Lots of Bruin fans must prefer music awards shows over college baseball, because it sure showed in the lack of attendance to last night's UCLA game vs. Cal State Fullerton.

The 246 people at Jackie Robinson Stadium were mostly scouts for major-league and college teams. Even the visiting Fullerton squad had more fans cheering them on than the Bruins did.

With that in mind, UCLA (7-8) has additional work to do as they try to keep their heads above water after 15 games. Not only do they have to win games to keep the fans, which they did not do on Wednesday night, but they also need to continue to believe in themselves as a team.

The Bruins lost to the Titans (8-5), 11-8. UCLA put together some good offense, but that was not enough for them to pull out a victory, as it might have been last season.

"The club has been doing good with the bats," hitting coach Vince Beringhele said. "We just can't get the wins."

Defensive errors during the course of the game helped Fullerton score a few times. Of the 11 runs that crossed the plate, four were unearned. Without the three errors, UCLA could have won the ball game, especially since the errors occurred in the pivotal eighth and ninth innings.

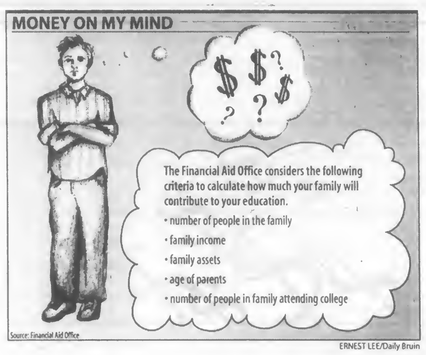
Middle-income students to receive financial aid



ERNEST LEE/Daily Bruin

EXPENSES: Only poor, rich can afford payments with current system

By Michael Weiner
Daily Bruin Contributor

Pop quiz: How do you finance a college education in an age of rising tuition? How do you pay for four or five years at an institution of higher learning if your family is already financially strapped?

Unfortunately, there are no easy answers to this question. And for many students, the act of financing a college education has truly become a test – of will power, that is.

But help is available. Need-based financial aid is a source of funds for about 26,000 UCLA undergraduate and graduate students. Aid can come in the form of grants, loans, and work study. And the aid system will change in the upcoming year, making aid more available to middle-income students.

Diana Lucero, a fourth-year psychology student, is one of those students. She received a 90 percent reduction on her registration fees because her father was permanently injured in the Vietnam War. She works at the UCLA Child Care Center to pay the rest of her school fees and her housing.

"The fee waivers really helped me out a lot," Lucero said.

In order to be considered for aid, students must file a Free Application for Federal Student Aid (FAFSA).

The most common grants are the Federal Pell Grant, which covers from $400 to $3,000 per year, and the Cal Grant.

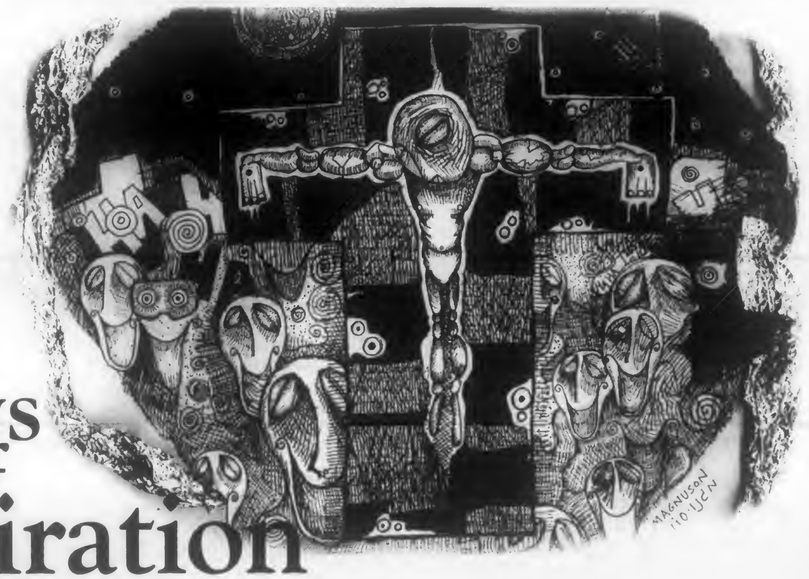
Many Christians use Lenten season to prepare for Easter renewal



Days of inspiration

By Carol McKay
Daily Bruin Staff

The season of repentance has begun. Ash Wednesday, the Christian holiday that was celebrated this week kicked off the Lenten season of reflection and sacrifice. And some students at UCLA dove into Lent headfirst, with a ceremony of ashes.

Windy conditions didn't stop over 100 students from gathering at Schoenberg Quad for a noon service of prayer, singing and receiving of the ashes. The service, held by the University Religious Conference, consisted of Biblical readings and psalms, and was attended by students of many faiths.

Ash Wednesday marks the first day of Lent, the 40-day period before Easter. In the Catholic church, a celebration of ashes takes place, in which burned palms from the previous year's Palm Sunday celebration are used.

Churchgoers receive a cross of blessed ashes on their foreheads, symbolizing the human origin of dust and penitence.

The custom is assumed to come from the seventh century, according to Pastor Soon Chung of the University Presbyterian Church. Chung said initially, Quadragesima Sunday was observed as the beginning of the Lenten season, and later, Ash Wednesday replaced it.

"It began as a discipline where people would fast. It was a way of (symbolically) dying. Now it is a form of mourning and preparation for Easter," Chung said, explaining that the Easter holiday signifies Christ's rising from the dead to give eternal life.

According to Chung, Lent is observed by many denominations, including Catholics, Episcopalians, Lutherans, Presbyterians and Methodists; a passage in the Bible – Genesis 3:19 – is usually cited as a reference for Ash Wednesday ceremonies.

"For me, it's a time to reflect on the ways God wants me to change and get ready for Easter," said Jennifer Kyle, a second-year psychology student.

Kyle, who attended the Ash Wednesday service in front of Schoenberg Hall last year, planned to celebrate it on campus again this year, despite last year's questioning looks from students who viewed her grey forehead with confusion.

"I knew a lot of people wouldn't understand what was on my head. Some people actually outright asked me what it was, and others gave me funny looks," Kyle said. "I didn't mind explaining it, because it's not just some dirt."

In more strict times, Lent was a season of abstinence and fasting, in which people ate one meal each day, and cut out meat altogether.

Today, it is customary for a person to choose an item to sacrifice for the season, and many students are expected to abstain from meat on Fridays. For students who live on campus, this can be difficult.

"In Catholic school, the cafeteria had "no-meat" Fridays, and I still definitely messed up a lot," said Barbara Williams, a first-year anthropology student. "But here in the dining halls, I think it's going to be even harder to remember."

Kyle, who has attempted to fast in past years, said that it is difficult but possible, and being around friends who can eat whatever they want adds to the challenge.

"It's really hard not to eat," she said, laughing. "But I've learned ways in which it can be easier. I try not to think about not eating food, but instead about how God is going to totally support me. As long as I don't focus on not eating, I can do it."

In addition to abstaining from meat on Fridays during Lent, some students plan to cut out personal favorites such as chocolate or soda, and others try to add a positive challenge for the season.

"I want to be a more joyful person," Kyle said, explaining her goals for the season. "I'm going to try to be a more loving person and to love everybody.

"Even the ones that are difficult to love," she added with a laugh.

Williams said she plans to sacrifice something close to her heart: chocolate and Coke.

"I'm giving up caffeine. And it's going to be tough," said Williams. "My mom just gave me a big box of chocolates, and I'm probably going to have to force my roommates to eat it with me by Tuesday."

COMMUNITY BRIEFS

Students plan action against U.S. sanctions

A group of UCLA students held an informal meeting on Wednesday to discuss possible action against U.S. sanctions in Iraq.

Representatives from various student groups, including the Muslim Students Association, African Student Union, the Environmental Coalition and the Free Burma Coalition, as well as individual students expressing interest in the issue, came together to inform and get informed.

Instead of focusing on the recent debate over bombing Iraq, the meeting mainly discussed the U.S. sanctions that have been in place for years.

"Bombing would have killed a few thousand people, but it is nothing compared to the genocide that has been going on since 1971," said Ahmed Shama, a third-year computer science student and editor of Al-Talib.

According to Shama, the general sentiment on campus is for lifting the sanctions, though there is some opposition.

"We are here to raise awareness and teach people what's going on," he said.

Students are planning to attend a candlelight vigil protesting U.S. policy against Iraq this Saturday in Beverly Hills. The vigil coincides with President Clinton's visit to Los Angeles.

Students are considering taking action as soon as possible.

"The situation had been going on for a while and it's important to mobilize within the next week or two," said Kandea Mosley, USAC president.

UCLA students gather signatures for schools

UCLA students have become a part of the statewide effort to get the Equal Education Opportunity Initiative on the November 1998 ballot. Their goal is to gather 800,000 signatures across the state for the initiative to get a place on the ballot.

Last week, Jesse Jackson pledged his support of the initiative.

The initiative, which allows the possibility of affirmative action in public education, was started by Berkeley law school students who founded the Students for Equal Opportunity to sponsor their initiative. It was conceived in response to Prop. 209.

Chavez Center history comes back to life

On Thursday night, the Cesar Chavez Center remembered its roots. In the Fireside Lounge at Hedrick Hall, Chicano/a activists and scholars gathered to remember the student-led movement that put the Chavez Center in place.

Guests and speakers included Professors Juan Gomez-Quinonesm, Rudy Acuna, and Jorge Mancilla, plus some of the students involved in the original hunger strikes that gained funding for the center: Marcos Aguilar, Milo Alvarez and Minne Ferguson.

Breslow to help new fund-raising efforts

Dr. Lester Breslow has been selected as the chairman of the Dean's Advisory Board of the UCLA School of Public Health.

Breslow will help raise $15 million to fund a new building and other needs of the school as part of the campus wide $1.2 billion fund-raising campaign.

He will lead a group of friends of the school in the fund-raising program.

"My goal is to help the school and its friends focus on how they can best support the teaching, research, and service programs of a truly outstanding school," Breslow said.

He is the current chair of the Public Health Commission of Los Angeles County.

Breslow formerly has served as the president of the American Public Health Association and dean emeritus of the UCLA School of Public Health.

Black history now

Origins of commemoration harbinger of celebrating cultural achievements

By Rachel Muñoz
Daily Bruin Staff

During a time when an African American was lynched every two and a half days, one man strived to change the perceptions of these so-called non-citizens and fractions of humans.

That man was Carter Goodwin Woodson, a lifetime devotee to the awareness of African-American achievements, whose contributions are still being celebrated today.

What is sometimes considered Woodson's greatest achievement is now known as Black History Month, originally Negro History Week. The week was first developed in 1926 to commemorate African-American history. For more than 70 years African Americans across the nation have continued to celebrate their history and progression during this month, but not without current issues threatening the continuation of Black History Month.

After receiving a doctorate from Harvard, Woodson decided to abandon mainstream academia to focus his attention on the scientific study of the African experience in America. In 1915, Woodson began African-American awareness by founding the Association for the Study of Negro Life and History, now known as the Study of Afro-American Life and History.

In 1926, 11 years later, came the start of Negro History Week, which would eventually transform into Black History Month in the '60s.

"Negro History Week was launched on a serious platform in 1926 to neutralize the apparent ignorance and deliberate distortion of black history," writes Yaw Boateng, a professor of education at Eastern Washington University, in the January 1995 edition of the Ghana Review. In order to bring a balance to the African-Americans' place in American and world history, Negro History Week sparked meetings, exhibitions, lectures and symposia.

Woodson is attributed as the Father of Black History, but Frederick Douglass was also instrumental in the progression of African Americans in our country.

Douglas, 57 years Woodson's senior, fought against segregation and spoke with President Abraham Lincoln about the problems of slavery. In 1845, after publishing his autobiography, Douglass left for England for fear his identity as a runaway slave would be discovered.

Honestly confronting painful past of slavery is only way to progress

Slavery

In a corner of a display case, outside of the Center for African-American Studies Library, sits this anonymous piece, typed on rectangles of purple paper. In this corner lies a written testimony of the pain still caused by this era of history, over 130 years later.

The poem addresses the frustration of African Americans, who are often requested to forget slavery, to forget the oppression, to forget the past. Should it be heeded? Can people be asked to forget history?

"That would be the worst thing," said Ellen Dubois, a professor in the history department. "It would be amnesia, not knowing who you are or where you came from."

Perhaps those making the call to forget are ignorant of the shocking history, or, like Sidney Lemelle said, it is a reflection of America's fear of facing and admitting its corrupt past.

"This country needs to admit that the foundation of it is racist," said Lemelle, a visiting associate professor in the Center for African-American Studies. He also went on to explain that the masking and sugar-coating of the past are all a part of what he called the "construction of American mythology."

In younger years, children are taught that Abraham Lincoln freed the slaves and was the good guy, that Thomas Jefferson was as good as the presidents get, and that so many people fought for the rights of slaves.

What they neglect to inform the young, growing minds was that although Abraham Lincoln freed African Americans from their roles as slaves with the Emancipation Proclamation in 1863, he actually said in the famous Lincoln-Douglas debates of 1858 that he was "not in favor of negro citizenship" and that had his home state, Illinois, had the power to make them citizens, he "should be opposed."

Video arcade a flashback to glory days of childhood

By Carol McKay
Daily Bruin Staff

The population of UCLA students largely consists of twentysomethings. The days of lunch boxes, legwarmers and pegged jeans are gone. Images of the A-Team and Knight Rider no longer dominate our television sets, and My Little Ponies and Legos have long been forgotten.

Yet, despite the fact that we conquered Space Invaders, Miss Pacman and Dr. Mario years ago, the arcades remain.

There's one in Ackerman. There's one in Westwood. And when the one near Sunset Village was rumored to be shut down, student hysteria ensued.

So what's the deal? Why are the male-dominated arcades so freaking popular? Haven't we outgrown this? Or is the popularity of arcades simply evidence of our tight-fisted, youthful nostalgia?

by a certain formula.

Family income, assets of the family, age of parents, number of members in the family, and number of people in the family that go to college are used by the financial aid office to determine what is called the Expected Family Contribution (EFC) according to Nick Valdivia, a financial training and compliance officer in the financial aid office.

The EFC is then subtracted from the cost of education to arrive at financial need.

"What the financial aid office tries to do is take that financial eligibility number and translate that to grants, loans and work study," Valdivia said.

The financial aid process in the University of California (UC) system will be going through considerable changes in the coming year, however. More financial aid will be made available to middle-income families, and not just lower income families.

"We're hoping to award grants to many of the middle-income students in addition to our neediest students," Valdivia said.

But Valdivia said that how to do this has not yet been finalized, and the definition of middle income has not yet been determined.

Nonetheless, the financial aid office expects to give more to middle income families for the 1998-1999 school year.

"It's good because you have to either be really poor to go to college or really rich," said Victoria Bui, a fourth-year psychology and biochemistry student. "The middle people can't afford it."

Some students still see faults in the financial-aid system. Martha Rivera, a second-year English student, thinks that money should be awarded to students whose families have worked hard to achieve stronger financial stability.

"I think they should take personal background into consideration," Rivera said. "They don't look at how much (families) have struggled to get to the income they're at now."

In addition to need-based financial aid through the university, many students look for outside scholarships to help fund their educations. This is where UCLA's Scholarship Resource Center, located in Covel Commons, comes in.

Only in existence for two years, the center aids students in finding scholarships that are suitable for them.

The Scholarship Resource Center has three main purposes, said Angela Deaver Campbell, the director of the center. One is to centralize all of the scholarship information spread around the campus into one location.

Another goal is to make finding scholarship information cost-effective for students. Finally, the center aims to "make the scholarship process more supportive for students," according to Deaver Campbell.

The center offers workshops to help students find scholarships and fill out applications, a typewriter which students can use to work on applications, and writing support from graduate students to help students prepare personal statements and essays for scholarship applications.

The center's web site, at http://www.college.ucla.edu/up/src, aims to help students with scholarship searches. But Deaver Campbell said that a students' best chance at finding suitable scholarships comes from the center's library of scholarship books.

"It's probably the most comprehensive resource we have," Deaver Campbell said.

She emphasized that scholarships do more than just aid in financing education, but they are also a good resume builder.

"There's certainly work involved, but the nice thing about scholarships is that they demonstrate that you have proven yourself outstanding in an area," Deaver Campbell said.

Merit-based financial aid also helps many students.

Brian O'Camb, a first-year undeclared student, received an Alumni Scholarship to help him pay for his education. Because he also qualified for need-based financial aid, O'Camb also received an additional grant from the Alumni Association.

"A couple of months into school, they sent me a notice that they had awarded me an extra grant because I was financially suitable," O'Camb said.

There also many forms of financial aid available outside of the school system.

Although it is difficult, most students somehow find ways to pay for college.

"Many families are having difficulty saving the amount of dollars it takes to finance an education," said financial aid director Ronald Johnson. "Financial aid bridges that gap."

Williams said that she drinks a lot of soda, coffee and tea, and avoiding caffeine will take quite an effort. So before the suffering begins, she had big plans to indulge in the days before Lent begins.

Williams is not alone in her tendency toward excess before Lent begins. Mardi Gras – also known as Fat Tuesday – is a holiday designed solely for that purpose.

"You need to get it out of your system," she said.

Lavish Mardi Gras celebrations take place around the world, with New Orleans, and Rio de Janeiro topping the list of famous party locations. The festivities are marked by extravagant parades, ornate costumes and, most of all, crazy behavior.

The celebrations last for days and are characterized by flamboyance and irreverence. But then the penitence begins.

"It's a time of self-examination and renewal," Chung said. And will power.

HISTORY

After returning to the United States two years later, Douglass founded an anti-slavery newspaper and led a successful attack against segregated schools.

Coincidentally, Douglass' birthday falls in February, a month that also includes the anniversary of the oath of office taken by the first African-American senator, Hiram Revels.

Although Negro History Week has blossomed over seven decades into Black History Month, the meaning behind the celebration hasn't seemed to change for some.

"It is necessary to use the occasion to examine the collective ingenuity, creativity, cultural and political experience of the masses of Africans and peoples of African descent," Boateng wrote.

But one UCLA history professor doesn't believe that African Americans are as interested in the month as Boateng believes.

"There is kind of crossroads that has been reached," said Robert Hill, a professor of African-American History at UCLA. "African Americans are now not as enthusiastic about the day ... There is some the great contradictions in history, Thomas Jefferson, as an author of the Declaration of Independence, believed that "all men are created equal," yet at the same time he owned slaves and even fathered a few slave children.

As for all those people who fought on behalf of slaves, a good majority of them were against slavery because they felt it was morally wrong. However, they were also "anti-black." Their fight was to end the institution of slavery, but that was it. It did not mean they were ready to accept the freed people as their equals.

Some Philadelphia Quaker meetings, though devoted to the anti-slavery cause, maintained segregated seating for African-American people in their churches.

It is impossible for one newspaper article to go back and try to recapture the grim and alarming life that existed for slaves and accurately do it justice. However, many do not know the truth or realize the atrocity of what happened in the "land of the free" back in the 19th century.

"'Amistad' is a perfect example," Lemelle said. "People go see it and say 'Oh my God, I didn't know it was that bad.' It's a debate that this coun-

Rumors fly as Washington tries to dethrone Hussein

IRAQ: Open talk of possible covert actions hinders ability of intelligence organizations to enact plans

By John Diamond
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON – The capital is abuzz with talk of plots to topple Saddam Hussein.

Ideas such as naval blockades, widened no-fly zones, paying saboteurs and broadcasting propaganda are bouncing between the White House, Capitol Hill and the CIA. Whatever else might be said about such proposed operations, it's getting awfully hard to call them covert.

"Public disclosure of covert operations are, by definition, not helpful," one intelligence official said Thursday. The official, speaking only on condition of anonymity, said the CIA and other U.S. intelligence organizations are examining a range of possibilities against Iraq but said the impetus is coming from policy-makers and lawmakers, not the CIA.

Distrust of Saddam's willingness to allow full weapons inspections, a growing sentiment that the Iraqi president must go and a sense in Republican circles that President Clinton is vulnerable to being seen as soft on Iraq have created an atmosphere in which ideas usually kept private are being bandied about in news conferences.

"There's more than a consensus; there's virtual unanimity that Saddam Hussein has to be deposed," Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., said Thursday.

Secretary of State Madeleine Albright told a Senate Appropriations subcommittee Thursday the administration will try to help opponents of Saddam.

"We look forward to working with a post-Saddam regime," Albright told lawmakers. "We have worked with opposition groups in the past, and we'll be working with them effectively in the future."

Paul Wolfowitz, dean of the Paul H. Nitze School of Advanced International Studies, proposed support for a provisional opposition government of Iraq, perhaps based around the opposition Iraqi National Congress. The United States could provide air cover for liberated areas within Iraq and weapons for forces on the ground.

"Anti-tank weapons, in particular, could have a powerful equalizing effect," Wolfowitz said.

Sen. Bob Kerrey, D-Neb., vice chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee, advanced a similar proposal, urging the administration to form an umbrella organization of Iraqi opposition groups, give them military support and allow them to spend frozen Iraqi government assets.

Rep. Chris Cox of California, chairman of the Republican Policy Committee, said that while ruling out assassination as an option, House Republicans would seek funding for a program aimed at toppling Saddam. It could include activation of a "Radio Free Iraq" broadcast from Kuwait.

Transit camp exhibition divides Jews

ISREAL: Immigrants in Middle East still try to overcome Anti-Semitism

By Danna Harman

OR YEHUDA, Israel – They gathered around a spacious, new army-issue tent in striped suits and fancy hairdos, and cocked their heads. This is not, they agreed, quite the way it was.

The elderly Iraqi Jews attending an exhibition on the transit camps of the 1950s came to reminisce about the old days: the crowded tents, the hunger, the floods and the humiliations.

As Israel turns 50, the display of cots, kettles and tin cups has triggered memories of a dark chapter in the nation's history. Hundreds of thousands of Sephardic Jews – immigrants from Arab countries who were encouraged to come by emissaries of the nascent Jewish state – were crowded into tent camps in the 1950s.

The camps had no running water, no sewage, no jobs and no privacy. They were meant to provide temporary relief, but many families stayed for years.

European-descended immigrants, or Ashkenazim, were also housed in camps, but, better connected and often better educated, they often received preferential treatment and moved out more quickly.

Solar eclipse of South America brings about enthused frenzy

ASTRONOMY: Groups gather to observe event that confused citizens

By James Anderson
The Associated Press

WILLEMSTAD, Curacao – Confused roosters crowed, and mothers thrust children under their beds during a solar eclipse of the sun that plunged much of Venezuela, Colombia and the Caribbean in deep twilight Thursday, inspiring awe and not a little fear.

Thousands of cruise ship tourists, Carnival revelers and astronomers gathered to behold the Western Hemisphere's last total solar eclipse of the century.

At Venezuela's Plaza Bolivar in downtown Caracas, New Age devotees formed a circle, closed their eyes and opened their palms in worship.

Families enjoying the spectacle on the Dutch island of Curacao spread picnic fare on a wind-swept plain dotted by 15-foot cacti and slow-running iguanas.

But in some places, the phenomenon caused panic. In Haiti, parents pushed children under their beds and youngsters raced to get home for fear of being struck blind – an exaggeration of the damage that can be done to unprotected eyes.

Confused roosters crowed as if it were dawn in Valledupar, a state capital in Colombia surrounded by ranch land. Nocturnal animals awoke while birds retreated to their nests, thinking it was bedtime.

"It's a mystery. Who knows what will happen? Who knows whether the sun will return?" Osman Jordan said as he arranged rows of apples, bananas and onions on a wooden stand at the pier of Willemstad, capital of Curacao.

Jordan, 42, had brought lanterns to light his stand.

Radio hosts spent the day trying to alleviate fears of a phenomenon this island won't experience for another 600 years. Around the Caribbean, government officials spent weeks educating the public. Some distributed special glasses for safe viewing.

United Nations debates ban on toxic dumping

KUCHING, Malaysia – Environmentalists and the United Nations urged rich countries Thursday to ratify a ban on dumping their toxic waste on the developing world.

Klaus Topfer, executive director of the U. N. Environment Program, called on the more than 300 delegates from 117 countries to show solidarity in ratifying a 1995 agreement that bans the export of toxic waste from industrialized nations to the developing world.

If ratified, the agreement would be the first global ban, although there are regional pacts against trafficking in hazardous waste.

The European community and seven other countries have ratified the ban, but a three-fourths majority of votes is needed from the 117-member body to pass.

Topfer estimated about 450 million tons of toxic waste are created annually. One goal of the convention is to set up regional centers for training in the technology and management of hazardous waste.

Among items up for approval at the conference are lists defining what materials are hazardous, including lead, cadmium and arsenic, and substances that are considered recyclable, such as copper, nickel and zinc ash.

Moscow denies having weapons program

MOSCOW – Russia's Foreign Ministry on Thursday angrily denied a defector's allegation that Moscow has continued to develop biological weapons under the cover of defensive research.

Russia has strictly complied with the 1972 Biological Weapons Convention, which bans the development, production and stockpiling of biological and toxin weapons, said ministry spokesman Valery Nesterushkin.

His statement was in response to Ken Alibek, a former Soviet expert in biological weapons, who says Russia is keeping portions of its Cold War biological weapons program alive.

In September 1992, Russian President Boris Yeltsin acknowledged the existence of a Soviet biological weapons program, and since then has declared that biological weapons-related activities are illegal.

Both Russia and the United States continue to do research on programs to defend themselves against biological attacks.

Three Israeli soldiers killed in south Lebanon

MARJAYOUN, Lebanon – Shiite Muslim guerrillas attacked an Israeli outpost in southern Lebanon today, killing three soldiers and wounding two others, Lebanese security officials reported.

There was no immediate comment from Israel on the attack, said to have been mounted by guerrillas of the Iranian-backed Hezbollah, using armor-piercing missiles and mortars.

Radio stations in Beirut quoted unidentified police officials as saying two Israeli soldiers were killed and three were wounded in the attack on the Blatt outpost, three miles from the Israeli border.

No explanation was immediately available for the discrepancy in casualty figures.

A Hezbollah statement issued in Beirut claimed responsibility for the attack on Blatt, saying "direct hits were scored," setting the targeted post ablaze.

All fortifications and some military vehicles at the post were destroyed, the statement said.

It added Israeli military helicopters were seen evacuating casualties. The security officials, speaking on condition of anonymity, said one of those wounded was in serious condition.

The deadly attack is likely to escalate tensions in Israeli-occupied south Lebanon, the last active Arab-Israeli war front.

Child molesters beaten by inmates

INVESTIGATION: Deputies allegedly urged convicts to attack sex offenders

The Associated Press

Several Los Angeles County sheriff's deputies are under criminal investigation for allegedly encouraging jail trusties, who are inmates with special privileges, to beat inmates accused of child molestation, a newspaper reported Thursday.

The investigation into the allegations began several weeks ago after an accused sex offender told jail administrators that other inmates had beaten him, the Los Angeles Times reported. Several trusties later said deputies had urged them to participate in the attacks, sources told the newspaper.

The sheriff's internal affairs investigators are looking into a dozen cases in which molestation suspects were either beaten or injured at the jail. The beaten inmates' injuries ranged from bumps and bruises to broken facial bones, said sheriff's custody chief Barry King.

A deputy and a civilian employee have already been relieved of duty in connection with the beatings, officials said. More suspensions are expected.

The Times reported that deputies would give the trusties the housing location of inmates or would send an inmate into a room where trusties would go in en masse and beat the suspect.

The investigation marks the department's first large-scale criminal brutality probe in more than 15 years, officials said. The last case involved half a dozen deputies who beat a man booked on suspicion of assaulting a police officer.

"People are placed in our jail as punishment, and not for punishment," Sheriff Sherman Block said Wednesday. "When they are in our custody, we don't have any right to physically – or in any other way – abuse them ... The investigation is proceeding."

King said an administrator at the Men's Central Jail first suspected a problem in late December, when he noticed a trusty carrying a stack of computer printouts listing the housing locations for various inmates along with the charges against them.

> Officials received information ... that molestation suspects were being attacked.

"The supervisor started an inquiry as to why an inmate would have this kind of information," King said. "The next day, the same supervisor got a couple of inmate injury reports. He noticed that these injuries involved child molester suspects."

During the last week in January, sheriff's officials received information from inmates that molestation suspects were being attacked.

At that point, King said, the officials requested that the internal affairs division be brought in to conduct a criminal inquiry. Investigators from the district attorney's office were asked to join the investigation this week.

King said the investigation is focusing on half a dozen deputies, but The Times reported as many as 14 officers may have been involved.

The accused child molesters – nearly 90 in all – have since been moved out of the Men's Central Jail and placed in protective custody at the Pitchess Detention Center, where they are being held in a special dorm.

King said the department usually tries to separate accused sex offenders from other inmates.

"In the jail inmates' minds, these guys are the lowest of the low," he said. "We know that there's a potential for violence."

However, because of jail overcrowding, a large number of suspected child molesters were being held at the Men's Central Jail pending transfer to Pitchess.

King said he believes the deputies at the downtown jail may have allowed their personal feelings to influence their treatment of the accused sex offenders.

Investigators are unsure how long the beatings had been going on, King said.

"We're doing a database run on all the child molest suspects that were housed at Men's Central Jail over the past several months," he said. "Then we are going to go out and interview those suspects."

State Supreme Court ruling puts Prop. 215 in jeopardy

MARIJUANA: Despite voter approval of '96 initiative, clubs cannot sell cannabis as medicine, justices say

By Bob Egelko
The Associated Press

SAN FRANCISCO – A state Supreme Court decision could shut down every medical marijuana club in California, despite a 1996 voter initiative that allows sick people to use the drug.

The court on Wednesday unanimously decided not to review an appellate ruling that said a marijuana club could not sell marijuana or act as a "primary caregiver" authorized to furnish the drug to patients.

The ruling now becomes binding on trial courts statewide. Senior Assistant Attorney General John Gordnier said he would use it today to ask a San Francisco judge to shut down a medical marijuana club founded by Dennis Peron, author of the 1996 initiative, Proposition 215.

"The courts have essentially said that cannabis clubs are not allowed," said Matt Ross, spokesman for Attorney General Dan Lungren. Apart from San Francisco, where local prosecutors and police allowed Peron's club to operate, Ross said Lungren would leave shutdowns up to local authorities and planned no action himself.

Peron insisted his club, now called the Cannabis Cultivators Club, is in compliance with the ruling because it no longer sells marijuana but merely collects reimbursement for cultivation costs. But if courts disagree and order a shutdown, he said, "we're going to stay here until the tanks come," he said. "It may be against the law to sell marijuana but it's morally wrong to let someone die, and we are saving lives here."

Federal prosecutors have also asked a federal judge to shut down Peron's club and five others, saying they are violating federal law against the possession and sale of marijuana, regardless of Proposition 215.

Proposition 215, passed in November 1996, allows possession and cultivation of marijuana upon a doctor's recommendation to ease the pain and nausea of AIDS, cancer, glaucoma and other conditions.

Peron's club, then called the Cannabis Buyers' Club, had been raided three months earlier by Lungren's agents, who said marijuana was being sold to people without doctors' prescriptions. They got a judge to shut it down, but it was reopened in January 1997 by Superior Court Judge David Garcia, who said Proposition 215 allowed a nonprofit organization to sell marijuana to patients who had named the club as their "primary caregiver."

SLAVERY

try has never come to grips with."

To those who are educated about all that occurred, it's difficult to ignore. Haunting images and narratives have been passed down, and live in everything from movies like "Amistad" to the poem posted in the basement of Haines Hall.

What happened to a whole race, displaced from their native country beginning as early as 1517, because of their darker skin color and because of the greed of Southern plantation owners, cannot be forgotten because it still affects the minds of descendants today.

Slaves were property; they couldn't get married, they were sold and torn from their families, they were beaten often to the brink of death, they were raped to "breed" more slaves once the international slave trade was abolished, they were over-worked and malnourished – the list could go on.

Although the institution of slavery was abolished by the 13th Amendment in 1865, it still lurks – not just in memory, but also in the economic and social problems of the present times.

"We won liberation, but that's not what we have in the new society," said Jihad Saleh, a fifth-year political science and sociology student with a minor in African-American studies. "They didn't ask us if we wanted to be citizens, if we wanted to have political power over economic power."

In a lecture concerning post-Civil War reconstruction, Dubois mentioned how although slaves had been given freedom and the chance to own their own property to live a self-sufficient life, in reality less than 10 percent actually owned any property.

Another student felt the African-American situation was unique from all the other instances of immigration in America's history, mainly because of the fact that they did not come to the United States by choice. From the beginning, oppression dripped into every aspect of their lives.

"You can see the effects just in terms of the way the African-American community is structured and the problems they have," said Chad Williams, a fourth-year African-American history student and African Student Union chair. "It can be traced back to slavery. We were not allowed to develop as a community."

Socially, the era left a problem that is still being dealt with today, racism.

"The vestiges continue," Lemelle said. "Slavery was maintained through physical force and coercive force by society. One way they did that was through racism."

Lemelle explained that by equating a black man with an ignorant and inferior slave, the pro-slavery society was able to justify its actions and at the same time instill the deep roots of racism.

"Racism is just built into the fabric of this country," Dubois said. "It's not something that will ever disappear. It was built into the structure of American history."

Reconstruction is still happening. It was only 30 years ago that our country saw the civil rights movement. But that doesn't mean the fight or the struggle is over, so forgetting the past is out of the question.

"In an ideal world that would be fine," Lemelle said, "I would say yeah, let's forget about it. But that doesn't wipe it out. It's not simply a black and white issue – it affected the poor European immigrants, the Indians, the Chinese and obviously the Mexicans."

History creates a ripple effect that reaches far into the depths of time. It defines what is today, it is a reminder, and it is a chance to look back and learn.

"In my mind there is a faint glimmer of hope (for the future)," Lemelle said. "But I'm not too optimistic, partly because of those people who say 'forget about it.'"

The end of the journey to social unity and equality that began with the 13th Amendment may be at the door or a mile away. But ignoring the past would be a step in the wrong direction.

kind of condescension."

In his 21 years at UCLA, Hill has witnessed a severe decline in interest in events on campus that celebrate the month. He once enjoyed listening to and exchanging views with people who visited the campus, but no longer experiences such events.

"(Black History Month) seems not to bring the same kind of motivation," he said. "The process of cultural assimilation is working."

Hill suggests that possibly the African-American community here at UCLA doesn't feel that this is a hospitable climate for the expression of African-American issues. He also sees that, as a school, UCLA's lack of interest for the month is partly responsible.

Students are also aware of the lack of events on campus.

"It's not as celebratory as it once was," said Tau Flagg, a fourth-year English student. "It's not being emphasized to youth, and without them embracing it, it is going to be forgotten."

But Flagg believes that although there appears to be a lack of celebration, that should change. Outside of Martin Luther King Jr.'s birthday, this seems to be the only time that there is a focus on African Americans. He feels the month should not only be emphasized more, but fully utilized.
